With flying feet, with a desperate resolve forming in her brain, she hastened homeward, but did not enter the house—dared not for fear of the thwarting of her purpose. As she passed the window she saw her old father nodding in his chair, and a satisfied smile parted her lips. For all the hidden wealth of mountain and canon she would not have him waken.

Well she knew the swiftest and most untiring horse in the stable. That it was one she had never ridden, a young, fiery, valuable blue blooded stallion, she never gave a thought. Speed and courage were the things now to be desired, and all other considerations, even her own safety, were dwarfed into nothingness by them.

With soothing voice and gentle hands the girl led the horse out, bridled, saddled and mounted. Astonished by her daring, he quietly submitted. The charm of womanhood had easily accomplished what had ever been a difficult task for men. Then, startled by the unusual burden and flapping of skirts about his flank, he reared, plunged, pawed the air, kicked vigorously and made a desperate effort to unseat the rider. It was unsuccessful. The hands that held the reins, little as they were, had a grip of iron, and the whip left a welt upon the glossy skin. Madly shaking his head, dashing out with his heels, with the breath whistling through the thin nostrils, he made a second attempt; shivered as he received a still more stinging blow, then dashed furiously down the road.

The clatter of hoofs disturbed the dreams of the old farmer. He sprang to the window, but only to catch an indistinct vision of something, glanced at the clock, murmured contentedly of having an hour before going for Nellie, and settled himself for another nap.

Little idea had he that his only child and costly steed were indulging in the wildest of races under a sky lighted as by the flames of hell and surrounded by its fires.

The switchman saw the girl as she flew past; saw the swift galloping horse, the rider with her long hair streaming in the wind, the horse as if breathing smoke—saw without recognition, and superstitiously imagined that the ghost of some red child of the wilderness, whose bones had been disturbed in building the iron track of the pale face, was out for a midnight revel.

For a considerable distance the road was over the undulating prairie, and both horse and rider enjoyed the race; then they were forced upon the ties, and heavily shod hoofs clattered along the bridges; then they left it and safety and plunged upon a narrow

But the impulse had been sufficient to cary him beyond the blazing death and the bushes closed behind and the trees rose above and protected them from the scorching shower.

"God be thanked," exclaimed the suffering girl as she knelt beside the gallant horse. "God be thanked, and she flung her arms around his neck and shed bitter tears as she saw how scared and burned he was, regardless of her own sufferings.

With difficulty she urged him to his feet and led him forward. But he knew as well as see of their safety, of the necessity of moving, and lamb-like followed deep into the wood where the cabin stood.

"John, dear John," rang out the voice of the girl.

"Nellie! Great God, is that you?" was answered and questioned, and a moment later she was locked within his protecting arms.

In a few words she told all, and begged him to do all possible for the horse.

"Now and ever," he answered. "One moment." He climbed to the top of a tall tree, looked around, descended, and said cheerfully: "The wind has changed; the fire is rushing away from the timber; we are safe here. But why in the name of heaven did you attempt such a dangerous chance, Nellie?"

"Because, dear, I loved you so," and she drooped fainting upon his anxiously throbbing breast.

had died intestate. A dreadful crop of lawsuits is expected to follow.

The native merchants of China are said to be inveterate swindlers. A foreign dealer at Tientsin recently contracted for 1,500 bales of camel's wool, guaranteed free of dirt and sand. When the first installment had passed through the cleaning machine 35 per cent. of its gross weight was found to be sand and gravel, and besides that the wool had been wet to make the dirt stick in and also to make it heavier.

It takes nearly one hundred million foreign eggs a month to keep the English in cakes and puddings. The matter of the protection of the English hen from the competition of the pauper fowls of France has been thought so serious that even Gladstone has paid some attention to it. Experts estimate that the consumption of eggs in England is one hundred a year for every person. Nearly fifteen million dollars is paid every year for the eggs imported into the country.

A plausible man has visited the farmers of Maine this fall, and after setting forth the value of birds as insect destroyers, and the wickedness of those who kill them, has presented a well worded document, apparently a pledge, not to kill a bird for a year, for the farmers to sign. If he did sign, the paper came back to him in a short time in the shape of a promissory note. Not a few agriculturists were thus swindled.

As the schooner Isle of Pines was off New London not long ago, an eagle slowly winged its way to the vessel, and perched on the topmast. The bird was evidently very tired, and kept its place until dark, and then Robert Burley, one of the sailors, climbed up and caught it by the legs. The eagle showed fight, and Burley was bleeding in many places when he reached the deck with his captive, which he caged and kept.

A flock of strange birds was heard going over Troy, Mo., one evening recently, and a short time afterward one which had strayed from the flock was captured by a servant girl in the yard, where it had alighted. It is about the size of a goose, black, web-footed, and with a long, snake-like neck and a strong bill three inches long. It is believed to be a cormorant, and to have come from the sea coast. It is still alive, and will eat nothing but live fish.

Gruyere cheese, which has been made by the farmers of Jura, Switzerland, under a system by which each in turn made a cheese of the milk of the whole community given to him every day, is now made in a factory to which all the farmers take their milk, and the product of which is common property instead of each cheese being the individual property of the man who made it. This makes the cheese more uniform and of better quality, and increases the farmer's profits.

From 8,000 to 10,000 gallons of blood a day are used in making buttons in a large factory in Bridgeport, near Chicago. About 100 men and boys are employed in the factory. The blood must be fresh beef blood. A Mr. Harsh was the first to introduce the business, some years ago, and is now immensely wealthy. Much of the blood evaporates in the process of drying, but the albumen remains. Blood sheets are used by cloth manufactures for "setting" the color in calico goods. These sheets, broken up, will make buttons, earrings, breastpins, belt clasps, combs, and even door knobs. There are a number of "blood" utilizing factories in England, and a blood door knob factory in Trenton, N. J.

In the Leipzig Stadt Theatre there is an enormous cistern that overhangs the stage, from which an alarming quantity of water can be flooded down on the boards at the shortest warning. The knowledge of this provision has hitherto been a great source of comfort to the actors. They were not, however, prepared for an impromptu that occurred two weeks ago. Without a moment's warning, and in the presence of stalls, pit, and curtain, nearly the whole company were soundly drenched. They had to make a very hasty retreat from the stage, to drop the curtain, and to get their clothes dried before they could again "go on." The audience seemed immensely amused, and no "demoralizing panic" has to be recorded.

For years a huge column of black smoke by day and lurid flames by night rolled up from a dense swamp, but no one penetrated the swamp far enough to discover the cause. Recently a young man noticed that the smoke and flame had disappeared, and he determined to find the spot where they had been. With great labor he worked his way into the swamp until he came upon a large mound of rent and shattered rocks, which looked as though they had been subjected to a terrific upheaval. Their under sides were covered with soot, and so were the crevices between, but no smoke or heat was discovered. The explorer decided that the fire was caused by the burning of a natural oil well, which had burned itself out.

Boiler-Scale.

The application of soda-ash or any other scale resolvent to a dirty boiler should be followed by a thorough cleaning shortly afterwards to remove any scale which may be detached or loosened, or injury to the boiler may result. The idea obtains in some cases that it is only necessary to put the solvent into the boiler and let it work, no further attentions being necessary. This is a great mistake. If a solvent does any good, its action is either to loosen scale so that it becomes detached either in flakes or in a finely divided state, or it dissolves it so that it remains in the water in solution.

In the first case, the accumulation of a

STATISTICS.

France possesses the largest area of vineyards in the world, consisting in round numbers of 5,000,000 acres of vines.

On an average, every man, woman, and child in the United Kingdom receives "a mail," as the Americans say, of 63 pieces per annum. This compares well with the 36 of France, the 18 of Austria-Hungary, the 35 of Denmark, and even with the 43 of Germany.

The orange industry of Florida has increased tenfold in five years. In 1880 only 100,000 boxes were shipped out of the State, while in 1884 and 1885 the exports were 1,000,000 boxes, and their value £3 0,000. The United States eatts, it is estimated, 600,000,000 of oranges yearly, enough to give to each man, woman, and child 10 oranges.

From the four principal mines in Griqualand—which all lie within a circle with a diameter of three miles—calculating the amount of diamondiferous ground removed and the known average yield per load in each, it is found that not less than 32,000,000 carets of diamonds—or more than 6½ tons weight—must have been extracted since the first discovery, realizing, in round numbers, £40,000,000 sterling.

The Metropolitan Police district extends over a radius of 15 miles from Charing-Cross, exclusive of the City of London, and embraces an area of 688·31 square miles, extending from Colney Heath, Hertfordshire, on the north, to Mogadore, Todworth Heath, in the south, and from Lark Hall, Essex, in the east, to Staines Moor, Middlesex, in the west. The ratable value of the metropolitan area for the year 1886-7 was £33,815,723, but of the enormous actual value of the property in charge of the police it is impossible to form any estimate.

The United States Debt reached its maximum at the end of August, 1865—a few months, that is, after the close of the Civil War. In round figures it then slightly exceeded £551,250,000 sterling, and the annual interest on the Debt somewhat exceeded £30,000,000 sterling. At the end of June last—the close, that is, of the last financial year—the Debt was reduced to a little over £235,000,000 sterling, and the annual interest charge to somewhat under £8,250,000 sterling. In the 22 years therefore £361,250,000 sterling has been redeemed; while the annual interest charge has been reduced by £21,750,000 sterling. This is a feat of which any people might be proud.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

If a man has a right to be proud of anything, it is of a good action done as it ought to be, without any base interest lurking at the bottom of it.

Any system of instruction which does not teach a lad to think falls very far short of the best results of education, and leaves him without the most vital element of success.

A fussy, nervous mother who is always trembling for the safety of her darlingst and will not let them do anything that their companions rejoice in, either makes her sons weak and deficient in self-reliance or drives them to deceitful habits of doing on the sly what they would not wish her to find out, though very likely in itself the amusement is harmless enough.

The intervals of life should not be left to haphazard—should not be regarded as idle waters in which each one may drift at pleasure without compass or guide. They should be held as trusts for certain definite objects, and regarded of as much importance

YACHTING ON LAND.

Swift Sand Boats in England—A Wagon with Wings.

Southport is the locality par excellence for sand yachting, the great stretches of firm, smooth sand along this part of the Lancashire coast affording ample "sea" room for the evolutions of these singular and somewhat ghostly looking craft. The sand yacht is simple in construction, consisting essentially of a long, narrow body, with seats along the sides for passengers, mounted on four wooden wheels. The back wheels of a sand yacht serve exactly the same purpose as the rudder of a boat. The wheels are strongly built, with wide treads to prevent their sinking in the sand when passing over soft places, and are covered with splash boards in the usual manner. The yachts are of different sizes, some being able to accommodate about twenty people, though they rarely carry so many. The smaller crafts are cutter-rigged with large mainsail and jibsail stretched from the point of a bowsprit some six feet long projecting from the front axle. The larger yachts have two masts, carrying mainsail, foresail and jib. The sails, rigging and running gear are almost identical with those common on boats and small yachts, the spread of canvas being about the same as on racing boats of equal length. Local fishermen form the crew, the cutters being manned by two and the schooners by three men.

When a sand yacht is ready for a cruise, with all sail set and her complement of passengers aboard, the steersman takes his place at the helm, while his mate gives the craft a start by placing his back to the front axle and pressing against the sand with his feet. When he feels that she is fairly under weigh he climbs nimbly on board and seats himself or stands near the mast, his duty being to attend to the jib sheet and keep a sharp lookout ahead, while the helmsman directs the course and looks after the main sheet. If there is a good breeze the yacht soon acquires considerable velocity, which is liable, however, to continual variation, according to the force of the wind and the state of the sand. At one time, with a fresh breeze and firm, smooth bottom, she may be gliding along at perhaps a rate of twenty miles an hour. Directly afterward a lull in the wind and soft or rough sand may reduce the speed to seven or eight miles. Regarding the maximum speeds attained, the fishermen tell some pretty stiff yarns.

We have heard a hundred miles an hour spoken of quite seriously; but there does not seem to be any good reason for believing that under the most favorable circumstances a velocity of thirty-five or forty miles an hour is ever exceeded. Even this is an enormous speed, and it is plain that the vehicles moving at anything approaching such a rate must be handled in a very careful manner to avoid accidents. And here we may say that the addition of powerful brakes to the front wheels would be an improvement. So far as we have noticed, none of the yachts are at present fitted with these useful appliances.

The sand yachts are able to proceed against the wind by "tacking" or making a zigzag course. With a stiff breeze they sail very close to the wind, and have a great advantage over their sisters of the sea in not making any "leeway."

Fogs.

Mr. John Aitken's theory of fogs is gaining credence, and it is certainly one that has much to recommend it. There can be no question that it covers the ground better than any other. Mr. Aitken attributes the production of mists, fogs, and rains to the so that it becomes detached either in flakes or in a finely divided state, or it dissolves it so that it remains in the water in solution.

In the first case, the accumulation of a mass of scale on the bottom of the shell is more than likely to result in burning the plates. The only thing to do is to open the boiler and remove it mechanically. In the second case, the result will depend more or less upon the nature of the scale and the amount and character of impurities that find their way into the boiler. If the scale is cut by the action of the solvent into a fine powder, and grease gets into the boiler, as it will in all cases where an engine exhausts into an open heater for the purpose of heating the feed, trouble is sure to result. Burning plates may always be expected in these circumstances. The only thing to do is to blow off all the water in the boiler, thoroughly clean it out, and begin again, omitting the grease.

Antidotes for Certain Poisons.

A standing antidote for poison by poison oak, ivy, etc., is to take a handful of quicklime, dissolve in water, let it stand half an hour, then paint the poisoned parts with it. Three or four applications, it is said, will cure the most aggravated case. Poison from bees, hornets, spider bites, etc., is instantly arrested by the application of equal parts common salt and bicarbonate of soda, well rubbed in on the place bitten or stung.

A gentleman once wrote to a lady whom he had offended by his dilatoriness, and who for a long time had refused to speak to him. His letter was earnest in supplications for forgiveness. It concluded with—"One word from your lips will make me happy. When and where will you speak it?" Her answer was—"Next Wednesday, at the altar." To which he sent the following reply: "will be there!"

waters in which each one may drift at pleasure without compass or guide. They should be held as trusts for certain definite objects, and regarded of as much importance and requiring as much thought and care as the principal business of life, which too often holds us with a relentless and nerve-relaxing grip.

No one should underrate the inevitable sorrows of life, nor deny to them the sympathy and loving aid which should ever be extended to them; but permanent misery cannot be regarded with very much respect. It certainly speaks of grave defects in character, of faults that need pruning away, of feeble qualities that need stimulating. Life is largely what we make it, and, whatever may be its clouds and storms, they will be chased away at length by the clear sunshine of a strong and noble character. "Fill thy heart with goodness, and thou wilt find that the world is full of good."

A highly interesting question is being agitated in Europe. It has been asserted that there has been a gradual decrease of blondes in Germany. Almost 11,000,000 school-children were examined in Germany, Austria and Belgium, and the result showed that Switzerland has only 11.10, Austria 19. 79 and Germany 31.80 per cent, of pure blondes. Thus the country, which since the days of ancient Rome has been proverbially known as the home of yellow hair, has to-day only thirty-two pure blondes in 100, while the average of pure brunettes is fourteen per cent. The fifty-three per cent. of the mixed type are said to be undergoing a transformation into pure brunettes. Dr. Beddoe, in England, has collected a number of statistics which seem to point in the same direction. Among 726 women he examined he found 369 brunettes and 357 blondes. Of the brunettes he found that seventy-eight per cent, were married, while of the blendes only sixty-eight per cent. were married. Thus it would seem that the brunette has ten chances of getting married in England to a blonde's nine. In France a similar view has been put forth by M. Adolph de Candolle. M. de Candolle found that when both parents have eyes of the same colour eighty-eight per cent. inherit this color. But it is a curious fact that more females than males have black or brown eyes to the proportion of forty-five to forty-three. It seems that with different colored eyes in the two parents fifty three per cent. follow the father in being dark-eyed, and fifty per cent. follow the mother in being dark-eyed. An increase of five per cent. of dark eyes in each generation must tell in the course of time.

The consumption of coffee in this country is now less than it was 20 years ago. Last year it fell 10 per cent. The present average is about 14 oz. of coffee and one-third that quantity of chicory per head.

has much to recommend it. There can be no question that it covers the ground better than any other. Mr. Aitken attributes the production of mists, fogs, and rains to the presence of particles of solid matter in the atmosphere. Professor Tyndall was the first to demonstrate how the atmosphere could be filtered, and to show it in a comparatively pure state. Mr. Aitken is of opinion that water-vapour clings to and condenses on these particles, either bringing them down as rain, or remaining suspended with them as mist or fog. Chloride of sodium derived from the sea is the most extensive fog-producer, but sulphur is the common base of town fogs; and he suggests that it is well that it should be so, because the sulphur has an antiseptic effect on the stagnant air, and saves us from worse evils than fog. This is good news to the sufferers from an annoyances which, if the theory broached be true, cannot be got rid of. There is no special cause of uneasiness as to the sulphur fogs, and, on the whole, they are blessings in thick disguise. All the same, if we strained our smoke a little, so as to get rid of the dirty carbon, it would be more cleanly, and altogether better for us.

Self-Made Men.

Self-made—though there is really no creature of that sort in creation—is a title which in current use has come to be received as a kind of indisputable challenge to admiration, a proof of intellectual nobility and fitness for high office. Great respect is doubtless due to the energy of any man who makes the most of his gifts or his opportunity. Such men may here and there rise to the peerage of the world. But the self-made man is badly made who is not ready to confess that other men might have made him better than he has made himself, and especially that institutions which gather and treasure up the wisdom of the past and are complicated instruments perfected by ages are likely to educate better than an individual mind, however vigorous, or an individual will, however resolute, or a personal aspiration left to itself, however persistent. Who would not rather have as his ruler, his doctor, his preacher, his attorney, or his judge, the pupil of the best that the world has thought and learned than the pupil of a master who is master and pupil at the same time, and who therefore at any given moment has an uneducated mind for his educator?

Two Experiments and Their Results.

The other night two American cruisers were anchored at Newport. They were provided with all the modern equipment necessary to repel a supposed attack of torpedo boats. The attack took place and the boats were beaten off in all directions. But it was only a few weeks ago that a simple experiment was tried in England and the torpedo boats carried all before them. There was no practical difference in the method of defence. In that the Americans were as good as the English, but at Portsmouth the authoritees used real torpedo boats that churned through the water at the rate of 22 knots an hour while at Newport they used row boats, or slow tenders, and they were discovered long before they could get near the cruisers.

LENNOX REFORMERS.

The adjourned meeting of the Lennox Reform Association was held in the town hall, Napanee, on Saturday afternoon last, a large number of representative men being present. Vice-President Hudgins occupied the chair, and asked that the election of officers be proceeded with.

On motion Mr Black was elected Secretary pro tem.

After the reading of the minutes of the last meeting, Mr Deroche said he did not think it was necessary to further deal with Mr Gibson's resignation as President of the Association and that he had much pleasure in nominating D. W. Allison for that position.

J. C. Drewry seconded the nomination, and Mr Allison was unanimously elected, He at once assumed the duties of his office, taking occasion to thank those present for the honor conferred upon him, and also to make a few remarks as to what the Association ought to be, and how managed. In the course of his remarks he referred to the question of unrestricted reciprocity, and declared himself strongly in favor of it. He declared it his belief that it Commercial Union was granted, that within a year's time every acre of land that he owned in this Province would increase in value from twenty-five to thirty-five per cent.

Proceeding with the election of officers—J. C. Drewry nominated Bowen E. Aylsworth, first deputy-reeve of Ernesttown, as first vice-President. H.M. Deroche seconded the nomination,

It was the wish of the Association that Geo D. Hawley be given this position, but as he preferred being out of office, Mr Aylsworth was unanimously elected.

Mr Chas Lane, of Napanee, was chosen as second vice-President and Dr Leonard was elected Treasurer.

On motion of R. N. Switzer, of Ernesttown, seconded by John W. Denyes, of Odessa, Mr Stanley C. Warner was elected to the responsible position of Secretary of the Association.

The officers of the association were appointed a committee to prepare a new constitution and by-laws and they were instructed to report at the next meeting.

The association then adjourned, subject to the call of the President.

The meeting was largely attended and the utmost good feeling and unanimity prevailed It was felt than there are bright days ahead for the association, and, judging from the feeling displayed at the meeting, there will be a rallying of forces around the new officers and determined efforts put forth for success in the future.

—Probably very few persons are aware of the enormous possibilities of cheapening light by the use of electricity, if only the problem of subdividing the "unit" of light could be satisfactorily solved. At present it is possible to supply one "arc" light, having an illuminating power equal to two thousand candles, for about four cents per hour. Such a light is, however, to a great extent, wasted in any ordinary building, and is quite too intense for household purposes. On the other hand, though great improvements have been made by Edison and others, no one has succeeded in producing a subdivision of the arc light without an enormous loss of power, amounting in most cases to ninety per cent. of the light produced by the arc. Could this subdivision be effected without material loss, it is obvious that no known species of light would have much chance in competing. One arc light, of two thouiand candle power, equals one hundred gas jets burning five to six feet of gas per hour, i.e., one arc gives light eqnal to that produced by the consumption of five hundred feet of gas of the best quality. It follows that if one arc light can be furnished for five hours at a cost of twenty cents, the same amount of light, if it could be subdivided into one hundred or even fifty portions, could be supplied at a rate about equal to eight cents per thousand feet of gas. Perfect subdivision is of course very unlikely to be achieved, but if the electric light could be subdivided into portions, with only a loss of thirty, forty, or even fifty per cent., it is clear that few other means of illuminating have much prospect. It is the knowledge of this fact, and that Edison believes he has now mastered the difficulty, which has so much to do with the present fluctuations of gas stocks in the American and European markets.

THE ARMY OF

CHEAPSIDE'S PATRONS

IS BEING RE-INFORCED EVERY MONTH.

The sales for November this year are seventy-five (75) per cent. more than for November last year, and are equal in volume to the ANNUAL SALES of plenty of houses.

Reader, Why is it?

Now then we want to have, and expect to have, and are bound to have, a larger increase for this month of December this year, over December of last year, than we have had for November.

WE ARE LAYING OUT OUR BEST ENERGIES AND WILL OFFER THE BEST POSSIBLE INDUCEMENTS TO COMPASS THIS END.

We have just laid in some bargains which, if you read the papers, and particularly our advertisement in the paper, then act as your judgment dictates, will result in our mutual profit. Some people, you know, boast that "oh, I never read advertisements," and that's where they often get left.

We will tell you a little story of a lady who "did not read advertisements", and perhaps dont take a paper, but that is a very unusual occurrence in this enlightened age. This lady went into a certain store to look at Seal and Persian Lamb Muffs. Their lowest price for No. 1 Persian Muff was $12. They were right, they are worth that, but this lady had heard we were selling Furs cheap, and came to see us, when she bought the same Goods at $7.50, ends bound with Seal and Seal Tassels. She had a narrow escape from losing $4.50, and you can just think what she could buy for that $4.50. Now we don't claim that these are every day occurrences or that we can do that the whole year around but it shows you we have often "rock bottom" prices in Goods which nobody else has, and that it is not safe to buy anything we deal in till you see our stock and hear our figures, any more than it is safe to "do without a newspaper" and these are every day occurrences of ... often "rock bottom" prices in Goods which nobody else has, and that it isn't safe to buy anything we deal in till you see our stock and hear our figures, any more than it is safe to "do without a newspaper" and never read advertisements.

We sell Persian Lamb Caps as low as $3.50, and our $6 Persian Lamb Caps are the same as other houses charge $9 and $10 for. Our best Seal Caps at $11 and $12, are the same as, or better than you can buy for from $15 to $17. Our seal Muffs at $12 are the same as you have to pay $18 for elsewhere, and more than that, we make a good fair profit on them at these prices, and more than that, they are first-class goods, made of whole skins, and with the best trimmings.

How do we do it? do you say.

Its all in the buying and judging, and in consequence of our large business—our ability to handle large lots.

One of our firm just returned from attending a Trade Sale of Mens and Boys Overcoats where he bought some Famous Bargains in Overcoats to fit Boys from 10 to 18 years of age, and all sizes of Mens Overcoats, so cheap that we shall be able to sell them at the regular wholesale cost.

Now lots of people don't know we sell ready-made overcoats so we have repeated it THREE TIMES, and set it in big type, that it may be so impressed on your minds that you will see it in your sleep.

MENS & BOYS OVERCOATS AWFULLY CHEAP
MENS & BOYS OVERCOATS AWFULLY CHEAP
MENS & BOYS OVERCOATS AWFULLY CHEAP

We will sell a good heavy Tweed Overcoat, mens' sizes, lined with Tweed, for $5, worth $7 anywhere, and all others in proportion. We also bought some elegant Seal Dolmans, worth $45, at such a price that we can sell them at $20 and $25, and make a fair profit. But it is not in Overcoats and furs alone we are giving bargains by any means, as witness "the wonderful value" of our Flannels, the "competition" "slaying" prices of our Silks and Satins

The "unapproachable value" of our Dress Goods
The "splendid value" of our Corsets and Gloves
The "home thrust" prices of our Hosiery
The "close prices" and good assortment of our Gents' Furnishings
The "death of all oppositiion" prices on our TableLinens, Towels, Sheetings, Pillow Cottons
The "low prices" on our Order Clothing, both Suits and Overcoats
The "style and reasonable prices" of our Millinery
We are awake and up to the wants of tee buying public
We are alive to the necessity of giving extra value to induce large patronage

We are Determined to Secure Your Confidence and good wishes, as well as your money, in exchange for the best value it is possible to give in Legitimate Goods

We will not misrepresent our Goods
We will not cheat you if we know it
We will give you the advantage of our close bargains and superior purchasing abilities
We will try to make your business intercourse with us pleasant and agreeable, as well as mutually profitable

HEALTH.

Hunger.

This is a sensation which correctly indicates the real wants of the system, at least, if the stomach is in a normal condition. It was manifestly intended that this should fairly represent—as the thermometer does the temperature—to what extent the body has been wasted, its tissues actually destroyed, by exercise, physical and mental food being indicated by this "foodometer," for the repair of such waste. Hard work, violent efforts, mental labors included, increase the appetite, simply because such unusual labors waste the tissues unusally,

On the other hand, if the usual amount of labor is diminished, there is naturally a diminished appetite, mercifully indicating a demand for less food. (It is for this reason that those who have been very active in business life, generally live but a short time after leading an indolent life, particularly those who do little save to eat and sleep. They overpower the organs of digestion, practically starve themselves. The digestive organs, in their debilitated state, being unable to appropriate enough to meet the wants of the system.)

On the principle of the formation of bad habits, by the use of intoxicants, tobacco, etc., the appetite may become so vitiated, so revolutionized, that what is regarded as hunger will not fairly represent the true wants of the system, never to be taken as a guide in the matter of food-taking. Thus, when one habitually uses too much food, more than the system demands, gradually learning to eat more by one-third than usual, a habit is formed, an abnormal appetite created, the result of which is an artificial hunger, or what is called hunger, in no sense reliable. A similiar result is produced when rich and unnatural food is taken, food which satisfies a false appetite, this sensation of supposed hunger being no more reliable then the tobacco-user's desire for the "filthy weed." Unnatural longings are induced by these causes, often mistaken for hunger, the gratificarion of which necessarily leads to dyspepsia and various digestive disturbances.

The Pancreas.

The pancreas is a long and narrow organ, extending horizontally back of the upper part of the stomach. It is what in animals is called "the sweet bread." Its office is to secrete one of the digestive fluids, called the pancreatic juice, which flows into the duodenum—that part of the intestines nearest the stomach. The pancreatic juice passes usually through the same duct that carries the bile, though sometimes it occupies a duct of its own.

In some respects it resembles saliva, and thus converts starch into sugar; unlike saliva, and like the gastric juice, it also digests albuminous food (flesh); and, still further, like the bile, it aids in digesting fat, forming an emulsion, and resolving it into glycerine and the fatty acids.

It will be seen that the pancreas is a very important organ, and yet less is known about its diseases than about those of any other organ of the body. Its proper symptoms are largely hidden by symptoms in other organs disturbed by it.

For instance, it may of itself give no sensation of pain, though greatly diseased; and yet the inflammation or irritation of the pancreas, extending to the neighboring "solar plexus," a great number of nerves near the kidneys, may give rise to agonizing neuralgias.

The pancreas may be congested, and suffer a consequent hemorrhage, because of obstruction in the portal circulation—the circulation through the liver. It may become shrivelled (atrophied) from wasting disease; the dilutent effect of water is often sufficient to eliminate an excess of alcohol from the blood, as after taking too much wine. Another effect of large draughts of water is to make the pulse slower, and to diminish slightly the normal temperature of the body.

Increase of weight has been claimed as a result of systematic water drinking on retiring for the night. The latest researches do not bear out this conclusion. Water thus taken will prevent any actual loss of weight, but it is not shown that it will do anything more. With the addition of a moderate stimulant, however, it has often a decidedly fattening effect.

To Remove Warts.

The Medical Press says that warts may be removed by the use of magnesia taken internally: "It is fairly established that the common wart, which is so unsightly and often so proliferous on the hands and face, can be easily removed by small doses of sulphate of magnesia taken internally. M. Colrat, of Lyons, has drawn attention to this extraordinary fact. Several children treated with three-grain doses of Epsom salts morning and evening, were promptly cured. M. Aubert cites the case of a woman whose face was disfigured by these excrescences, and who was cured in a month by a drachm and a half of magnesia taken daily. Another medical man reports a case of very large warts which disappeared in a fortnight from the daily administration of ten grains of the salts."

Cure For a Bone-Felon.

Take the juice of the leaves of rue, one tablespoonful; good, strong soft soap, one tablespoonful; and the juice of one red onion; these three articles should be thoroughly mixed, then add a piece of alum and a piece of copperas, each the size of a small marble, finely pulverized; when the whole has been well mixed it is ready for application, by pouring it into a soft, thin leather bag or oil cloth to fit the diseased member, but not very tight, let it remain on till suppuration takes place. The time it takes this composition to produce suppuration depends on the length of time the felon has been in progress; but it will generally remove the pus from the bone in the course of two hours, when the suffering will cease.

Disinfection of the Sick-Room.

In the sick-room no disinfectant can take the place of free ventilation and cleanliness. It is an axiom in sanitary science that it is impracticable to disinfect an occupied apartment, for the reason that disease-germs are not destroyed by the presence in the atmosphere of any known disinfectant in respirable quantity. Bad odours may be neutralised, but this does not constitute disinfection in the sense in which the term is here used. These bad odours are for the most part an indication of want of cleanliness or of proper ventilation; and it is better to turn contaminated air out of the window or up the chimney than to attempt to purify it by the use of volatile chemical agents, such as carbolic acid, chlorine, &c., which are all more or less offensive to the sick, and are useless so far as disinfection—properly so called—is concerned.

Mont Blanc.

Mont Blanc may, perhaps, on account of its great height,—15,781 feet,—and its immense glaciers, of which the "Sea of Ice" is the largest, and which covers one hundred and four square miles, be called the most famous mountain in the world. This mountain celebrated its centenary this year; that is to say, the people of Chamou-

The Little Church Covered With Ivy.

BY NORA LAUGHER.

One spot in the home of my girlhood
Is graved on my memory still,
The little church covered with ivy
That stands at the foot o' the hill.

No place half so peaceful and prayerlike
As that near the whirr of the mill
On the bank of the rippling river
That flows at the foot o' the hill.

I have seen many silvery streamlets,
To me none so dear as this rill
Which waters the English "God's Acre"
That stands at the foot o' the hill.

I listen to far grander music
Which never has power to thrill
My soul, like the simple old anthems
We sang at the church o' the hill.

Stored in my heart's garner no picture
Could ever replace or refill
The little church covered with ivy
That stands at the foot o' the hill

What Hath Life For Thee, Brother?

BY L. A. MORRISON, TORONTO.

Life hath days of peace
For the pure in heart;
And a sweet increase
For all whose part
Hath been well and truly done
In love and faith before the sun,—
Hath been well and truly done.

* * * * *

Do thy part;
Let thy heart
Be pure.

Life hath wealth untold:
Each bright brooklets runs
Over sands of gold.
Her faithful sons
Shall be crowned each happy day;
Who toil, and trust, and watch, and pray,
Shall be crowned each happy day.

* * * * *

In thy place,
—By His grace—
Live right.

Life, with toiling past,
Hath, through Jesus' Blood
For us each, at last,
Sweet rest in God:
A Home by His dying won,—
A "Crown of Life" for work "well done;"
A Home by His dying won.

Trust in God,—

Stray Lines in Other Lands.

I.—WAITING ON LONDON BRIDGE.

I stood there watching all the people,
The throng that came and went
Until the bells struck from the steeple
And half the day was spent.

There came no face that smiled up to me,
And yet I waited long;
No well-remembered friend who knew me
Of all the hurrying throng.

The river seaward ran beneath me,
The increasing throng above,
Nor was there one who would bequeath me
A friendly look of love.

How little did I know that waiting
Across the stormy sea,
One by Heaven's gentle fating
Was waiting there for me.

II.—AT HOLYROOD.

Alas for thee, poor Mary, Holyrood
Is opened to the world—the coarse, the crude—
The noisy Yankee and the ribald stare
At the dimmed grandeur of thy bed-chamber.
Here by the window where the sun once shone
So often on thee, Mary, in days gone—
Where you have slept aforetime, murdered queen, Grief swells above for what all has been—
Fate was it, Mary, that they should discover
Thy secrets and kill thine Italian lover?—
There is a stain where his red blood did spill,
A great black spot and it remains there still
There is a stain, Queen, on thy life, time's river
Will ne'er wash out, for it is stained forever.

neuralgias.

The pancreas may be congested, and suffer a consequent hemorrhage, because of obstruction in the portal circulation—the circulation through the liver. It may become shrivelled (atrophied) from wasting disease; from diabetes; from pressure of other enlarged organs, or tumors, on it; from fatty degeneration; from old age.

Its ducts may be obstructed, and result in destruction. Calculi may form in it. Cancer may attack it.

It will be sufficiently evident from this catalogue of maladies of the pancreas, many of which may easily be mistaken by the patient for a liver trouble, or a disorder of some other organ, that all such disturbances of the system should have the faithful care of an experienced physician.

Persons who "doctor themselves" may guess rightly what ails them, but they are quite as likely to guess the wrong disease, and they may even be in error as to the organ that is out of order.

Positions that Affect Sleep.

According to Dr. Granville the position affects sleep. A constrained position generally prevents repose, while a comfortable one woos sleep. He says lying flat on the back with the limbs relaxed would seem to secure the greatest amount of rest for the muscular system.

This is the position assumed in the most exhausting diseases, and it is generally hailed as a token of revival when a person voluntarily turns on the side; but there are several advantages in the supine posture which impair or embarrass sleep. Thus, in weakly states of the heart and blood vessels and certain morbid conditions of the brain the blood seems to gravitate to the back of the head and to produce troublesome dreams.

In persons who habitually in their gait or work stoop, there is probably some distress consequent on straightening the spine. Those who have contracted chests, especially persons who have had pleurisy and retain adhesions of the lungs, do not sleep well on the back.

Nearly all who are inclined to snore do so in that position, because the soft palate and uvala bang on the tongue, and that organ falls back so as to partly close the top of the windpipe. It is better, therefore, to lie on the side, and in the absence of special diseases rendering it desirable to lay on the weak side so as to leave the healthy lung free to expand, it is well to use the right side, because when the body is thus placed the food gravitates more easily out of the stomach into the intestines, and the weight of the stomach does not compress the upper portion of the intestines.

A glance at any of the visceral anatomy will show how this must be. Many persons are deaf in one ear and prefer to lie on a particul side, but, if possible, the right side should be chosen. Again, sleeping with the arms thrown over the head is to be deprecated, but this position is often assumed during sleep, because circulation is then free in the extremities, and the head and neck and muscles of the chest are drawn up and fixed by the shoulders, and thus the expansion of the thorax is easy.

The chief objection to these positions is that they create a tendency to cramp and cold in the arms, and sometimes seem to cause headaches during sleep and dreams. These small matters often make or mar comfort in sleeping.

Water as a Medicine.

Ordinary drinking water, if taken in large quantities, acts as a solvent and diuretic, and also increases the perspiration if the temperature of the air be high. Taken in the quantity of one or two quarts at a time, mense glaciers, of which the "Sea of Ice" is the largest, and which covers one hundred and four square miles, be called the most famous mountain in the world. This mountain celebrated its centenary this year: that is to say, the people of Chamounix, at the mountain's foot, have celebrated the hundredth anniversary of its ascent by Benedict de Saussure, an illustrious man of science, who was the first to climb Mont Blanc. Chamounix has erected a monument to De Saussure, which has just been dedicated, and it will also raise one to Jacques Balmat, who was De Saussure's guide on the occasion of his first ascent in April, 1787.

De Saussure was a botanist, and his botanical studies at the base of the mountain had given him a strong desire to climb to the summit. It was no idle curiosity which prompted him, but a desire to obtain a knowledge of the geological laws which had governed the formation of the chain of the Alps, which fixed the age of its granites and limestones, and would explain the composition and apparent disorder of its ledges.

Two Englishmen, Pococke and Wyndham by name, had attempted the ascent before. They came with a retinue of baggage-bearers, and even with soldiers, and were dressed, for some unknown reason, in Arab costume. They ascended no further than the timidest travellers now climb, and were then compelled to turn back.

Having finally provided himself with hardy mountaineers for guides, De Saussure set out for the summit. He was gone four days. Almost at the outset a terrible avalanche swept away one of his guides.

Presently the rarity of the air began to tell on the whole party. After throwing three or four shovelfuls of snow that lay in their path, the men would sink down exhausted. The wilderness of glaring snow blinded them; the thinness of the air made their ears buzz, and they became the victims of fears and hallucinations.

Their food was soon frozen. Fearing every step might be their last, the men faltered, but De Saussure urged them on and on.

Finally, the last precipice was climbed. Could the men believe their eyes? They were at the summit. De Saussure has left an account of his impressions, in which he says:

"It seemed to me like a dream when I saw below me the majestic summits, the redoubtable peaks of the other Alps, whose very bases had been difficult and dangerous of approach to me.

"I noted their position, their relations, their structure; a single glance resolved the doubts that I had been trying years to clear up!"

De Saussure died in 1799, so that he has been a long time awaiting his monument. Jacques Balmat, who accompanied him, became a famous Mont Blanc guide. Once, with only his staff, abandoned by his companions, Balmat spent three days at the top of the mountain. Since De Saussure, nearly eight hundred travellers have climbed to the summit where he was the pioneer.

A man who attended fifty bull fights in Spain was asked the other day why he went to so many. "In the hope that I might see one of the bull fighters killed," he answered. "The sport is so brutal and cruel that I wanted to see the men who are the cause of this brutality receive a just compensation for their work."

The Chambers of Commerce of Milan, Pavia, Vicenza, Sienna, and Ravenna have sent to the Italian Merchants' Exchange of San Francisco for samples of seed of alfalfa and millet, with the idea of trying to introduce them into Italy.

III.—A Rain Shower on Lake Windermere.

The pearly drops of rain
Are falling once again
Flowers and leaf it softly drenches
In the dark green chestnut branches.

And the mist drops brightly twinkling
Fall on dried leaves half unwrinkling,
Fall here and there and come
To this red-flowered geranium.

A gold-finch where the branches swing
Flies with its fluttering yellow wing,
A little wanderer
Without a thought, without a care.

Here the hill-top rises proud
In the gem-shot folds of cloud;
There Windermere's unruffled sheen
Shines through the leafy sprays of green.

Phenomenal.

"Oh, George!" cried young Mrs. Merry, running to meet her husband at the door. "I've something the best to tell you."

"No?" said George; "what is it?"

"Why, don't you think—the baby can talk! Yes, sir, actually talk! He's said ever and ever so many things. Come right into the nursery and hear him."

George went in.

"Now baby," said mamma persuasively, "talk some for papa. Say 'How do you do, papa?'"

"Goo, goo, goo, goo," says baby.

"Hear him!" shrieks mamma, ecstatically. "Wasn't that just as plain as plain can be?"

George says it is, and tries to think so, too.

"Now say, 'I'm glad to see you, papa.'"

"Da, da, boo, bee, boo."

"Did you ever?" cries mamma. "He can just say anything! Now you precious little honey bunny boy, say, 'Are you well, papa?'"

"Boo, ba, de, goo, goo."

"There it is," said mamma. "Did you ever know a child of his age who could really talk as he does? He can just say anything he wants to; can't you, you own dear little darling precious, you?"

"Goo, goo, dee, dee, di, goo."

"Hear that? He says, 'Of course I can,' just as plainly as anybody conld say it. Oh, George, it really worries me to have him so phenomenally bright. These very brilliant babies nearly always die young."

Abstract Ideas.

Very often parents and teachers are grievously disappointed on finding that, in spite of all their patient explanation and convincing arguments, which have been received without question or dissent, the practical conduct of their charges is in direct opposition. They think that they have failed in the manner of presenting the subject, and hasten to make fresh efforts, with perhaps no better success. Their mistake may be traced to an undue reliance on abstract ideas. While it is well to cultivate a child's thinking powers and to call his attention at times to the relation between knowing and doing, it should never be forgotten that such general ideas can dawn upon him only by very slow degrees, and can operate as a motive force only in rare cases and in small measure.

A work done in our sight by another directs us better in the practice of it; it is more acceptable and of more powerful efficacy to reform us than admonition by word.

VARIETIES.

The Presbytery of Dallas (Texas), says the New York Independent, has just ordained and received into full membership a negro graduate of Lincoln University. He passed as thorough an examination as any white man in Hebrew, Greek and Latin, the sciences, philosophy, theology, Church history and then preached an extemporaneous ser which all said was unusually fine. He has full and equal rights in the Presbytery and nobody is hurt. Now, that is Christian and is an argument against driving negroes into separate bodies. Of course it is, and yet, if such a man as referred to were seeking admission into some of our theological halls in Toronto would he be sure of receiving a hearty welcome?

There are no greater sinners against a country's welfare than those who would encourage the maintenance of more than one language within its borders, for there is no greater cause of national weakness than diversity of tongues. Wherever the English flag flies there should the English tongue be the official one, and wherever there is an English colony, there nothing but English should be used in the schools or in the courts of law. All are welcome to come to such lands, but it should be on one distinct understanding, that their children must go to schools where English is the common and official tongue. If people cannot submit to such a condition, all right. Let them stay away from the country. Don't let them come and then grumble of hardship. Whether it be Gaelic or French, or German, or Swedish or anything else it does not matter. In schools and courts English ought to be supreme. Gaelic is dying out. Let it die. It may have been the language of Paradise. It is not going to be the language of Canada. So of French. To have two special Canadian languages is worse than absurd. It is criminal. In short to encourage the permanence of different languages in any country is to encourage and promote national disintegration.

To all appearance the end of the old German Emperor is at hand. He tries to go forth and shake himself as at other times, but, poor old man, the effort makes the real facts of the case only more apparent. He no doubt rallies after his different attacks of illness, but with the weight of ninety years upon his head it is not to be expected that such rallies should be more than the mere sudden flickering before the light finally goes out. It is generally felt that his death, along with the sickness, and it is to be feared, fatal sickness of his son, will greatly endanger the peace of the world. Bismarck is old, no doubt, but he is not yet used up, and with young Prince William as Emperor he may carry through another war with France, to make, as he says, the Fatherland finally and for a long time secure. Hot rinks, so goes the rumor, that war is inevitabte, and that the present is just as suitable a time for it as can be expected. He is bound to bleed France white t is time, and his opportunity comes when his old master disappears. It is very horrible to think of people calmly speculating on a European war, with all its horrors, and arranging for it coming on at an early date. When will men be wise and try to settle their differences in a more reasonable way?

Another of those disgraceful whisky riots has taken place in London the little. It would seem that the friends of free whisky are bound by every means in their power to bring themselves and their cause into discredit. Surely every man is entitled to protection against mob violence. Even a criminal who has been caught red handed is protected by all the strength the executive credit. Surely every man is entitled to protection against mob violence. Even a criminal who has been caught red handed is protected by all the strength the executive can exert against mob violence or lynch law. It is one of the very first principles of civilization that it is in every way to be prevented that people should take the law into their own hands. If the men who were mobbed in London had been horse thieves they would have been protected from violence so as to let law have its solemn and regular course. But because they were detectives acting under the sanction of law and seeking to make the Scott Act effective, the officials then, like their brethren in Woodstock, winked hard and allowed the unfortunates to be half killed. Such wiseacres may find themselves brought up by a sharp turn. Mr. Mowat has lately informed them that all officials are bound to uphold every law in the statute book whether they approve of it or not. It surely did not require a Premier to lay down as a great principle what seems the very tritest and most evident of axioms. Still it is well that officials who have a natural sympathy for whiskey and lawlessness should understand that they tread on dangerous ground when they cease to enforce any law which has not received their personal endorsation.

Russia never gives up any of her schemes. She may have to hold them in abeyance for a longer or a shorter period. She may have to give up talking about them, but she never gives up thinking, and in due time she show that if all things are not made to work together for good, everything is turned to issue eventually for her advancement. She can wait, she can appear to recede. But all the same she waits her time, and when the hour strikes she is ready. Constantinople is the prize she keeps sturdily in view. She has been looking and longing for it more than a hundred years and she is as determined as ever upon securing it. One of her deplomatists lately put the matter in the following way:—'Constantinople is destined to be ours; we shall have it by envelopment. European Turkey is so largely Slavic that we shall expand into all that region; and the people, Roumanians, Bulgarians, Bosnians, Servians, will be one with us, to the banks of the Dardanelles and the Sea of Marmora. Nothing can keep Russia back in that direction. The people are already Russian. They will welcome us as deliverers from the Turks. Europe can never object to the gradual and healthy expansion of an empire. If any nation seizes upon any great strategic point, then it becomes a European question. Russia attempted that, and will never repeat her mistake. But, when Russia shall have gradually expanded into European Turkey on one side, and into Asiatic Turkey on the other, so as to envelop Constantinople, into whose hands will it fall? The wisest and most moderate statesmen of Russia know well that she is not ready for that great possession. To have it now might cause great and dangerous divisions. The later it comes the better. It is the military element of the Government that is rash and impatient. But our Czar will never be forced by it into conflicts with Europe. Constantinople will give to Russia certain rights, for which she must contend until she attains them. She must have a free, untrammelled passage through the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles for her commerce and her fleet, with no frowning forts on their shores. When Russia has all that, there is one thing further. We shall then dispute with England the passage through Egypt, if we do not get her Indian empire through Afghanistan. That Russia is bound to have, because she alone knows how to govern the people of the empire."

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

HOUSEHOLD.

Indoor Amusement for Children.

The woodbox will afford one if it is full of sticks, split or round, of different kinds of wood. Let the little folks take out the sticks, one by one, and bring them to you to name. Oilnut, oak, maple, birch, beach, elm, hemlock, and ash wood may be in that pile in the box, and even the little six-year-old can easily be taught to detect and correctly name some of the varieties. The smooth, mottled bark of the beach, the ragged shreds of the yellow and gray birch, and and the color and crystal beads of pitch gum of the pine and hemlock when in round sticks. Sections of limbs are sure guides of their kind and easy to name, but not so always when the wood is in split sticks, without a tell-tale half-inch of bark surface.

Perhaps you cannot tell a chip of maple wood from one of elm or beach. If so, you can study the contents of the woodbox and chip basket with your children. Tell them elm wood and sound rock maple and oak wood, whether in split or round sticks, seldom snap when burning, and are comparatively safe for night fires in open, deep fireplaces. Tell them if they want to burn big holes in mamma's carpet and rugs, to lay butternut and poplar and soft-wood pine, cedar or hemlock on the open fire and let the sticks pop live coals right and left, as well as straight ahead from the grate.

Tell them an old nurse, many years ago, burned a house and seven poor people in it one night because she could not tell one kind of wood from another. She rolled a great backlog of butternut wood on to the andirons of the big fireplace one evening for a night fire to keep warm a little new baby and its mother, believing the log was of elm wood, and when they were all asleep a live coal snapped out and burned and smoldered away in the floor till it blazed into fierce, leaping flames that roared and rushed so terribly swift, that all the people up stairs were burned in their beds.

I once saw a woman camp down one night on a thick cotton comfortable spread before an open grate, while watching with a sick child. She knew so little about wood she thought one kind was as safe as another, and did not think the poplar sticks she had just laid on the fire would snap and throw coals, but they did, and if the child had not roused with the dense smudge of burning cotton, no doubt the smoldering puff would soon have blazed and done terrible mischief.

I know a little boy who has a boxful of sections of different woods. He is always on the lookout for a new specimen and has a bit of every kind of tree or shrub he can find in his father's fields and woods. When visitors come, he delights in showing them his collection of woods, and in having them puzzle over the pretty cubes and cylinders of wood, and if they mistake a kind he is quick to know it.

This indoor study of chips and wood brought in to replenish winter fires will amuse the children when time hangs heavy, and by close notice of bark and fibre and grain and smell and color and slivering of wood they will soon learn to detect the common kinds from each other, and, perhaps, wake to such an interest in the study, that when summer time again comes, they will commence a collection of native woods, and the green growing trees and shrubs will bear to them new, keen interest.

Cleaning Lamps.

Cleaning the lamps is very apt to be put off until the latter part of the day, as they seem able to wait attention better than some other things. In many households the duck of early evening reminds the hurrying CUSTARD PIE.—One pint of milk, three eggs, one tablespoonful of sugar, salt; flavor with extract of lemon.

APPLE FRITTERS.—Stir into one quart of milk thin slices of apple, two teaspoons of baking powder, a little salt, and two eggs; add flour to make a stiff batter and drop by the spoonful into hot lard; sift sugar over them while hot.

MAHOGANY CAKES.—One pint of milk, one and one-half pints of flour, two eggs, piece of butter the size of an egg, salt; bake in cups.

Mutton Suet as a Household Remedy.

It is very vexing and annoying, indeed, to have one's lips all break out with cold sores, but, like the measles, it is far better to have the cold strike out than to strike in. A drop of warm mutton suet applied to the sores at night, just before retiring, will soon cause them to disappear. This is also an excellent remedy for parched lips and chapped hands. It should be applied at night in the liquid state, and be well rubbed and heated in before a brisk fire, which often causes a smarting sensation, but the roughest of hands, by this treatment, will often be restored to their natural condition by one application. If every one could but know the healing properties of so simple a thing as a little mutton suet, no housekeeper would ever be without it. Get a little from your butcher, fry it out yourself, run into small cakes, and put away ready for use. For cuts and bruises it is almost indispensable, and where there are children there are always plenty of cuts and bruises. Many a deep gash that would have frightened most women into sending for a physician at once, I have healed with no other remedies than a little mutton suet and plenty of good castile soap. A wound should always be kept clean, and the bandages changed every day, or every other day. A drenching of warm soap suds from the purest soap that can be obtained is not only cleansing but healing; then cover the surface of the wound with a bit of old white muslin dipped into melted mutton suet. Renew the drenching and the suet every time the bandages are changed, and you will be astonished to see how rapidly the ugliest wound will heal.

He Was Only An Englishman.

A certain Englishman went by ship to France about the beginning of this century. He was very stout and paralytic, and when he came on board glared morosely—as paralytic gentlemen sometimes will—at the officials who addressed him. As for answering them, he never dreamed of doing such a thing. The idea never entered his head; and the two liveried footmen, both Frenchmen, who supported him, had to explain as best they could the stolid silence of their master. "C'est un Anglais—voila tout"—"He is an Englishman—that is all"—they whispered to the astonished captain. The ship was no sooner in motion than his servants hurried him off to his private cabin, and arranged him so that he could go to sleep. The winds blew, the waves dashed over the ship, the footmen were horribly ill, but the paralytic gentleman lay in his birth like an infant slumbering in its cradle. It was observed by the sailors that his cabin reeked of tobacco, and the presumption was that while the horricane was at its height he had been aroused, and had indulged in a good smoke. At last port was reached, and the footmen, finding their master still stretched out at full length, had to raise him up unceremoniously and remove him from the ship. Still the same silence and the same forbidding glare, Was it a foreboding of the terrible fate that now awaited him? After his bags had been examined at the Custom-house, the two treacherous men-

ROYAL WEDDING GIFTS.

The Emperor of China's Presents to His Bride—Curious Selections.

The choice of the bride for the young Emperor of China has at last been made, and in due time the daughter of the Duke of Chao, the brother of the present Empress, will be Empress of the Celestial Empire. Although the wedding will probably not take place before 1889, thousands of hands are already busy with the lady's trousseau and wedding presents, which have probably never been equalled in wealth at any other court.

The following are the presents which the young Emperor is presenting his fiancee before their marriage, after the actual engagement present which consists of a gold seal, richly inlaid with jewels, the handle being formed by two gold dragons. Up to a month previous to the wedding the lady is presented with ten piebald horses, with complete trappings; ten gilt helmets and cuirasses, 100 pieces of satin of the first quality, and 200 pieces of cotton material. As wedding presents the bride receives 200 ounces of gold, 10,000 ounces (taels) of silver, 1 gold tea service, consisting of teapot and 1 cup, with a lid; 1 silver tea service, 2 silver wash basins, 1,000 pieces of satin of the best quality, 20 horses with complete trappings, 20 horses without trappings, 20 saddles for pack horses and mules.

The parents of the lady receive also 100 ounces of gold, one gold tea set, 5,000 taels silver, one silver tea set one silver wash basin, 500 pieces of silk, 1,000 pieces of cotton material, six horses completely harnessed, a helmet and cuirass, a bow and a quiver with arrows, each parent one court dress for summer and one for winter, one every-day dress, and a sable coat. The brothers and servants of the bride also receive rich and costly presents.

The bride's hats are the most remarkable articles among the rich trousseau. The winter court hat has a rim of sable, the crown is made of red velvet, from the centre of which rises a button composed of three parts, each of which is ornamented with three small oblong pearls of particular beauty, and seventeen ordinary pearls, while in the centre of each part another splendid pearl is set in gold, and surmounted by a gold phœnix. The button is surrounded by seven gold phœnixes, of which each is inlaid with seven large and twenty-one small pearls and a cat's eye.

At the back of the hat, below the button, a gold pheasant is placed with one cat's eye and sixteen pearls. The tail of the pheasant is divided into five parts by 302 small and five large pearls, forming a pendant, the centre of which is made of a lapis lazuli, surrounded by pearls. At the end of the pendant a big coral is suspended. A collar is fastened at the back to the hat, the outside of which is of sable, the inside of bright yellow material, with velvet ribbons embroidered at the end with diamonds.

The three gala court dresses are of a dark blue color, with borders of gold embroidery, and large dragons embroidered all over the dresses, while down the front are sewn in gold thread the words "Wan-Fu" (eternal happiness) and "Wan-Shon" (eternal life). The necklaces and chains are of an enormous value, and composed for the most part of pearls, turquoises, corals, and diamonds. A handkerchief which is worn in the belt is green, richly embroidered, trimmed with tassels of jewels and yellow ribbons.

A gala apron of red and blue satin, trimmed with otter skin and embroidered in gold, dragon fans, and skirts of many different kinds are also a part of this gorgeous outfit, and the furniture for the future Em-

Cleaning the lamps is very apt to be put off until the latter part of the day, as they seem able to wait attention better than some other things. In many households the dusk of early evening reminds the hurrying housewife that her lamps are still neglected, and she then fills them hastily and is obliged to light one at once. This is wrong, because the vapor of the oil about a freshly-filled lamp is liable to explosion. A lamp should be filled at least two thirds in depth, and one which has but a spoonful or two of oil in it should never be lighted, as the empty oil space is filled with explosive vapor.

Lamps filled to overflowing are very uncleanly, soiling everything brought in contact with them; and to most persons, the odor of kerosene is extremely unpleasant. A lamp-wick should fit exactly into its space and should be kept clean. When it becomes black from the sediment in the lamp, it must be thrown away, or washed and dried before using again. When nearly burned away, a wick may be lengthened by a fold of canton flannel, which, reaching to the bottom of the lamp, will feed the wick as the oil burns out. It is not best to put strips of red flannel or yarn into a lamp, as the inside should be colorless, that any impurities may be seen. If such appear, wash the wick, empty and cleanse the oil reservoir.

A burner sometimes becomes so clogged that it does not allow perfect combustion of the oil. In such a case, remove it from the lamp, place in cold water in which a sliced potato has been added and boil an hour or two; rub with a dry cloth, when it will be entirely clean and bright as new. To keep the chimneys shining and clear, nothing is better than daily washing them in soap and water and rubbing them clear with a soft cloth free from lint; old print is good for this purpose. A small sponge attached to a stick is convenient for washing lamp chimneys.

Hanging lamps are best to use where there are small children to endanger upsetting. Common table lamps and small metal hand lamps on a broad saucer-like base are the most safe to carry about, as it is nearly impossible to overturn or break one.

Contributed Recipes.

CHILLI SAUCE.—Two very large ripe tomatoes, two onions, two green peppers, all chopped fine; two tablespoons of salt, two cups of vinegar, two tablespoons of sugar; boil one hour. If the vinegar is very strong, use two cups to one of water, more sugar and less salt, and simmer half-an-hour longer. You will have a sauce that will even be an improvement to grange beans, a dish that is always highly complimented.

LEMON TAPIOCA.—Three tablespoons tapioca soaked in cold water till it can be stirred to a mixture of the appearance of milk. Let it come slowly to boiling, and boil till clear as a jelly; then add one cup white sugar, quarter of a teaspoonful of salt and the juice of one large lemon, or two small ones. To be eaten cold, with milk or cream and sugar if desired; but it is very nice without.

CRACKER PIES.—Four common crackers, one cup of water, one cup of molasses, one cup of sugar, one cup of raisins, one half cup of melted butter; add spice as for mince pies.

LEMON PIES.—One lemon, one cracker, one cup of sugar, one egg and one cup of water; grate the rind of the lemon and add the juice.

MOCK APPLE PIE.—The juice of two lemons, two cups of sugar, two cups of water, three soda crackers rolled, and three eggs; season with nutmeg.

from the ship. With the same choice and the same forbidding glare, Was it a foreboding of the terrible fate that now awaited him? After his bags had been examined at the Custom-house, the two treacherous menials hurried the fat and paralytic Englishman to a hotel, took off all his clothes, and then proceeded to cut off his face and hands! But such was the phlegm of the paralytic man that he neither spoke nor uttered cry, nor did one muscle so much as quiver. This perhaps was not so strange as might at first appear when it is explained that the corpulent cripple was in the hands, not of two footmen, but of two smugglers disguised as such, and that he consisted—with the exception of his hands and face, which were wax—entirely of tobacco, which in the garb of a human being was thus introduced free of duty into the sunny land of France.

Life in Siberia.

The Russian policy of banishing troublesome citizens to Siberia has been one of the worst features of the Czar's despotic government. To those accustomed to good society, and to comfortable habits of living, such an exile is a living death. The severity of the climate, the cruelty of the officials, the general character of the people, and the separation from old friends, make the life of banishment almost intolerable.

But recent travellers in this dreary land bring to light some facts which mitigate the evil of the cruel exile. The families of the banished prisoners are permitted to join them, as the government argues wisely that a prisoner will be more contented, and less inclined to engage in new plots, if family life is re-established.

There are also opportunities of acquiring wealth, by working in the mines, or engaging in overland commerce. One exile, by birth the son of a serf, who had large business capacity, became a millionaire by establishing the overland tea trade.

Others have been equally fortunate in other branches of business, so that a few, a very few, of the prisoners prefer to remain in their new home when the long sentence of exile has expired.

Unconventional People.

Everybody has encountered the people who take to themselves what they suppose to be the credit of being unconventional, who offer a statement of that fact as the sufficient excuse for all sorts of violations of good breeding and social rules, and who assume the license to do as they please, as if they had the power to lift themselves above the authority of ordinary canons of behaviour. It is a pity that these foolishly self-blinded and, for the most part, decidedly unpleasant people cannot be made to see their conduct in its true aspect. It should not be forgotten that society is, in a sense, in an artificial state. Whatever general natural principles underlie it, its formulated rules are purely arbitrary, and it is, in effect, a conventional arrangement. It follows that one who wishes to take part in its social life must accept its conditions. To attempt to be unconventional in society is an anomaly and a contradiction of terms.

Appropriate Mottoes.

Hotel Keeper—"I want to put up some sort of a notice to keep guests out of the back hall. Some of them have got into the kitchen, and the chief cook is very jealous of his professional secrets."

Friend—"Send out and get a 'No admittance' sign."

Hotel Keeper—"That sounds too harsh. I want something which won't look so much like a regular order—some motto or other."

Friend—"Oh, put over the kitchen door 'Ignorance is bliss.'" med with otter skin and embroidered in gold, dragon fans, and skirts of many different kinds are also a part of this gorgeous outfit, and the furniture for the future Empress is keeping every trade brisk throughout China.

Turkish Superstition.

Some curious stories of Turkish superstition are related by the anonymous author of Stambul und das moderne Turkenthum, the most light-giving of recent works on the internal condition of the Turkish Empire. The mysterious caprice with which distinguished arrivals at Constantinople are treated by the Sultan and his ministers is explained by an anecdote told of the well-known astronomer Peters, when he visited Constantinople in 1850 with letters of introduction from Humboldt and other eminent men of science. He found it impossible to proceed with the mission with which he was charged, because on the same day that he was presented to the Grand Vizier, Reshid Pasha, by the German ambassador, the man-of-war Nustretie was blown up in the arsenal. "This Frankish astronomer," the Grand Vizier is reported to have said, "either knew that the explosion was going to take place or did not know. In the former event he is a mischievous person for not warning us; in the latter he is an impostor;" and forthwith the word was passed that Peters was not to be encouraged or assisted. Sometimes a visitor unconsciously carries his comdemnation in his name. In the reign of Abdul Aziz no one was more persistently snubbed at Court than Dr. Muhlig, physician to the German Embassy; and all because the Turks pronounced his name "Muchlik, which in Arabic means "murderer."

Honest and True.

This is eminently the case with Polson's NERVILINE, the great pain cure. It is an honest remedy, for it contains the most powerful, the purest, and most certain pain subduing remedies known to medical science. It is honest, for it does all it claims to do. It is honest, because it is the best in the world. It only costs 10 or 25 cents to try it, and you can buy a bottle at any drug store. Nerviline cures toothache, neuralgia, pain in the back and side. All pains are promptly relieved by Polson's Nerviline.

A WONDERFUL SUCCESS.

The following are a few of the many testimonials received by the Breadmakers' Yeast Company:

I bought a package of your yeast from our Grocer, and am happy to say that I think it altogether superior to anything of the kind in the market. It rises quicker, makes lighter and sweeter bread than any yeast I have tried yet and I think I must have tried them all, and I intend using yours for the future.—MISS ELLA LAVIS, Prescott.

I have tried your yeast. I am fourteen years old and never did a baking before, but I have baked with your yeast to-day according to directions, and had excellent bread.—MISS E. WIDEMAN, Stouffville.

I am a little girl 13 years old, I never baked before. I did it with your yeast and father says he thought mother was the best bread maker in the country; he says that I made from your yeast as sweet bread as ever he ate. My name is Mary M. Palmer. —MR. JOSIAH PALMER, Sebright P.O., Ont.

I bought a package of your yeast and have tried it and like it very much. I have been baking bread for the last 24 years, and I find it to be superior to any other yeast I have ever used.—MRS. H. RUSHTON, Dundas.

I am a young girl but twelve years old and have tried your yeast cakes and can say that they are excellent. I don't see why any young girl cannot learn to bake nice bread if she uses Breadmaker's Yeast. Our folks are delighted with my bread.—SYLVIA HAMMOND, Villa Nova.

Justifiable Generosity.

"Take a cigar with me, boys?"
"Are they on a boy or a girl?"
"Neither."
"What's happened, then?"
"Oh, I spent an evening at Simpson's, where they have both a boy and a girl, and I'm setting 'em up because I have neither."

—Last week the friends of Mr. W. J. Doller, mail clerk on the N. T. & Q. R., received a genuine surprise. On Friday last the fact of his having been united in marriage to Miss Minnie Douglass, of Tamworth, became known. The ceremony was performed about a month ago by Rev. W. S. Smith, of Centreville. Willet's many friends hope his wedded life may be a prosperous and joyous one.

—The Dioptric system of measuring lenses was unanimously adopted and recommended by the second international congress, ophthalmology and of medicine which met in 1875, being adopted from the report of a committee appointed by a previous congress to devise an improved method. Its standard is the metre which is everywhere the same in length, while the old standard, the inch, differs in different countries. Hence a lense whose focal distance is one metre is said to measure a dioptric. Thus the new system is to be preferred because it is adapted to all countries, by its common standard and has the sanction of all leading authorities. F. Chinneck is the only one in this district who has a dioptric instrument

—There is no better Christmas present than a fine life-size portrait made by the bromide process at Hulett's studio. Those desiring such are requested to call at once as from present appearances Mr. Hulett will be extra busy from now until after the holidays. By leaving orders early better pictures can be secured. He is also turning out some handsome cabinets which only require to be seen to be appreciated. Mr Hulett has on hand a fine stock of albums which will be sold at reduced prices during the holiday season.

—That THE EXPRESS is the leading adversising medium of Lennox and Addington, has become a recognised fact. It reaches nearly every home in the county, the few who do not subscribe for it borrowing at times from their neighbors "just to have a look at it." We have had a number of direct evidences lately of its value, In one instance there were no less than nine replies to one advertisement inside a few hours, and last week Mr. K. J. Strong advertised having found a good fur robe. The same evening the owner, Mr. Wm. Sutton, of Newburgh, saw the advertisement and came in for it. He had lost it on his way home from Napanee.

—On Thursday of last week special constable Cronk was sent to Odessa to arrest R Wycott, on the charge of selling liquor under the Scott Act. He arrested his man in the hotel, and handed him over to county constable Hillier for safe keeping. Wycott watched his chance and made a bound for the street, Cronk was after him hot-foot and, seeing he was makiug for a hiding place, pulled a revolver and fired in the air. The prisoner pawed the ground but did not move a foot, and he was recaptured. A friend attempted to save him by picking up a stone and threatening to throw it, but upon being favored with a glimpse of the revolver dropped the missle. Wycott was brought to Napanae, before James Daly, J.P.. who imposed a fine of $50 and costs for infraction of the act.

THE NEW POST OFFICE.

The Address to the Ministers—The Document Placed in the Stone—Banquet Notes.

Following is the full text of the address read by Mayor Cook to the Ministers at the laying of the corner stone of the new post office on Thursday of last week:

To Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works, and Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, Minister of Customs:

Honorable Sirs,—We, the mayor and members of the corporation of the town of Napanee, desire hereby to express to you our kindly feelings in this your official visit to our town.

It has seldom been our privilege to entertain Ministers of the Crown, and it is with more than ordinary pleasure that we this day extend to you a cordial welcome, so closely identified as you are with the great work of Confederation.

The result of your efforts, gentlemen, and those of your colleagues is that we have to day the Dominion of Canada embracing half a continent and spanned by the most extensive and magnificent railway system in the entire world.

Under your administration our seafaring facilities are prominently utilized, our water stretches brought into practical usefulness, and the commerce of our country has been steadily increased until our influence is now felt and acknowledged throughout both the eastern and western hemispheres.

But it is pleasing to know, gentlemen, that amid the great questions which must of necessity occupy your attention our wants here are not forgotten.

The beautiful edifice which, on behalf of the government, you are presenting to us to-day, will stand as a monument of your good will towards the County of Lennox, the pioneer district of the Province of Ontario.

We trust, Honorable Sirs, that your visit here will be most pleasant and agreeable, and that you will never have cause to regret the sacrifice which you must of necessity have made in honoring us this day with your presence.

at the Campbell House, was, if anything worse than the afternoon's "entertainment". Perhaps we should qualify this. If we take Worcester for it, a banquet is a feast. This there was on Thursday night, for mine host Johnson had even excelled his former efforts in this line. The bill of fare would be difficult to excell, Mr Johnson being complimented on all hands. Mrs Johnson also came in for considerable praise, the table decorations being such as to call forth encomiums. The large dining hall looked exceedingly pretty, being nicely decorated with bunting and flags. A portrait of Sir John hung at the head of the room. We previously said that if we take Worcester as authority for the meaning of a banquet there is no room for questioning. If, however, we take it in its more modern acceptance it was an absolute failure. The management was defective throughout. Finding that the running of things on political grounds during the afternoon was unpopular, the Wilson-Lapum clique endeavored to swing the banquet into a citizens' affair. It was no go, however. Notwithstanding that for two days previous different individuals did their best to sell the $5 tickets, some had to be given away in order that fifty (the number guaranteed Mr Johnson) might be made up. We are credibly informed that 51 sat down at the tables. As, according to the local Tory organ, "the attendance included the

We could if we felt inclined, make the assemblage look more ridiculous; suffice it to say that, taking out those who are directly interested in the new building, forty were present and in that number are included a number of parties who received complimentary tickets. In other words, the Tory Beaver notwithstanding, the gathering was not a representative one, of either the town or district, and on Wilson, Lapum & Co lies the blame.

After the good things had been partaken of, the following toasts were proposed and responded to in the order given: "The Queen", by the Venerable Archdeacon Bedford-Jones; "Her Majesty's Ministers" was responded to by Messrs Langevin and Bowell; "Those who have been instrumental in bringing the wants of the town to the notice of the Ministers", by Mr M. W. Pruyn, ex-M.P. and Uriah Wilson; "The Architect and Contractor", by Messrs G. Neelands, F. Bartlett and Geo Cliff; "The Corporation", Mayor Cook; "The Ladies" Messrs G. W. Goodwin, Jas E. Herring, and A. A. Richardson.

The Record.

The record placed in the stone read as follows:

The corner stone of this building was laid on the 21st day of June, 1888, in the fifty-second year of the reign of Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, by the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin and Hon. Mackenzie Bowell.

The cost of the building is estimated at $30,000 and is erected by the government of the Dominion of Canada for the accomodation of the following offices in the town of Napanee: Post office, custom house, inland revenue office, gas inspectors office, weights and measures inspectors office, customs examining warehouse.

The contractor is George Neelands, Esq., of the city of Kingston; Thos. Fuller, Esq., of the Public Works Department, Ottawa, is chief architect; Frederick Bartlett, of Napanee, is local architect; James E. Herring, Napanee, is clerk of works.

The Governor General of the Dominion of Canada is Baron Stanley, of Preston, in the Peerage of Great Britain.

The cabinet ministers are Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, K.C.B. Premier, etc., etc.; Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works; Hon. J. H. Pope, Minister of Railways; Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, Minister of Customs; Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron, Minister of War; Hon. John Carling, Minister of Agriculture; Hon. John Costigan, Minister of Inland Revenue: Hon. J. S. D. Thompson, Minister of Justice; Hon. J. A. Chapleau, Secretary of State; Hon. G. A. Foster, Minister of Finance; Hon. C. H. Tupper, Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Uriah Wilson, Esq., is sitting member for the riding of Lennox and John W. Bell, Esq., for the riding of Addington in the House of Commons.

The members of the Legislative Assembly, Toronto, are: W. W. Meacham, Esq., M. D., for Lennox and John S. Miller, Esq., for Addington.

The Dominion officials resident in Napanee, are W. H. Wilkison, Esq., Judge of the county court of Lennox and Addington, chairman of the general sessions of the peace and revising barrister for the electoral division of Addington. Gilbert Bogart, Esq., Postmaster; G. M. Elliott, collector of customs; Chas. B. Perry, landing waiter in H. M. Customs; W. L. Hamilton, Esq., inspector of inland revenue for the district of Kingston; Fleming Rowland, Esq., collector of inland revenue, division of Kingston.

The members of the municipal council of the town of Napanee are H. L. Cook, Esq., M. D., mayor; T. G. Carscallen, Esq., Reeve; E. S. Lapum, Esq., deputy reeve. Councillors: East Ward, John Fennell, Wilder Joy and W. T. Gibbard; West Ward, Chas. Lane, W. D. Madden giving the names of the cabinet ministers, town officials, etc., was the penmanship of Mr. Jas. E. Herring, who has been privileged to write a number of similar documents. It is needless to say it was well done; more like printing than writing.

The deceit displayed in the management was even shown in the address. It was no wonder that there were expresions of surprise when the following clause was read: "The result of your efforts, gentlemen, and those of your colleagues, is that we have to-day the Dominion of Canada," etc., etc. The listeners naturally asked what had Bowell to do with confederation. He did not sit in the House until the year the united Provinces set out as the Dominion of Canada.

Reasons for the Fizzle.

As everything, as far as weather, etc, was concerned, was favorable to a great gathering it is quite natural that the people should ask "Why the Fizzle?" The reasons are numerous.

First and foremost it was through the conceit of Uriah Wilson, Ed. Lapum and Capt. Holmes, who undertook to run the affair themselves without consulting the other members of the committee; in fact they put on at least two names without even asking their consent.

Another reason is that it was run as a political affair. At first it was to be non-political, but Wilson and Lapum thought they could see a "boom" in it for themselves and took it in their own hands; as a consequence the people felt reluctant to aid them in working up a scheme for their own benefit.

The unsatisfactory manner in which replies were given to the query: "Is Sir John coming?" created distrust. Had Lapum and Wilson taken the townspeople into their confidence a much larger crowd would have been present, even had it been definitely announced that only Langevin and Bowell would speak.

The promises of Sir John and his following, re good times and crops, had much to do with the fizzle. Farmers felt sorely at the promises made but unfulfilled, and naturally kept aloof from anything that would tend to show their sympathy for the party in power.

The keeping of The Express in the dark concerning the affair had no little tendency to weaken the confidence of the public. When Lapum, as secretary, was asked for information, his reply was "Oh! Sir John, Hector and Mackenzie Bowell will be here." Had politics not been introduced there was no reason to withold information from the Reform journal. On the other hand, every reason that all information be furnished.

Another reason, and not the least either, was that the people had lost confidence in Lapum, through the mismanagement of the demonstration last year, and the utter disregard Wilson had for the state of the people when making his speech on commercial union in the House.

Many more reasons could be given, all pointing to the incompetency of Wilson and Lapum. These are sufficient, however.

$, tickets some had to be given away in order that fifty (the number guaranteed Mr Johnson) might be made up. We are credibly informed that 51 sat down at the tables. As, according to the local Tory organ, "the attendance included the leading gentlemen of the district," we give the names of those who were present and alongside those who were not present :

Notes.

More flags were displayed than on the 24th May.

The absence of drunkenness throughout the day was quite noticeable.

The Ministers were driven round town during the afternoon by Mayor Cook.

The Ministers were guests at the Huffman House. It was decorated for the occasion.

The address to the Ministers was neatly penned by Mr. J. W. Robinson of Robinson & Co.

The near approach of the Ministers was announced by some tramp horn and bag pipe players and some harpers.

The reformers were hinted at as being pollywogs by Mackenzie Bowell. Think of a citizens' banquet after that !

The "record" above is an exact copy of the document placed in the stone. THE EXPRESS is the only paper giving it.

Had it not been for the townspeople there would have been very few more than can be seen on an ordinary Tuesday market day.

THE EXPRESS inserted in the stone was a copy of the issue containing the difficult nuts to crack given Uriah and his importations.

The 47th batt band came up from Ganan oque camp and played for the occasion. They were entertained at supper at the Campbell House.

Many were the expressions of dissapointment at the turn things had taken. What should have been a great demonstration amounted to nothing.

It will be noticed that the name of Hon. Mr. McLelan, the late incompetent Finance Minister, and more recently Postmaster General, was left out of the document placed in the stone.

A noticeable "feature" of the day was the absence of cheering. During the laying of the stone there was not a cheer until a Reformer suggested one ; then several faint ones followed.

One thing that must have been distasteful to Uriah was the credit given by Mackenzie Bowell to M. W. Pruyn, M. P., as the first to move in the way of securing the post office for Napanee.

Alex Henry and Uriah Wilson, M. P., accompanied Messrs Langevin and Bowell to Deseronto, where they were guests of Mr E. W. Rathbun until the departure of the str. Deseronto for Trenton.

Several of the committee of the day did not even receive an invitation to the banquet and others did not know they were on until after the banquet they saw a bill of fare with their names on.

The whole thing was a failure from beginning to end ; thanks to Uriah Wilson and Ed Lapum. Had they consulted the members of the committee it would have been otherwise. They chose, however, to run the show themselves and a fizzle of fizzles it proved.

The document placed inside the stone, regard Wilson had for the state of the people when making his speech on commercial union in the House.

Many more reasons could be given, all pointing to the incompetency of Wilson and Lapum. These are sufficient, however.

CHEESE.

1,500 boxes sold at Ingersoll on the 26th for 9¼.

The highest price paid at Peterboro board on Wednesday was 9¾

Two more cases have been before the Belleville police magistrate for tampering with milk. Judgment has been reserved.

On our supplement will be found the judgment of the police magistrate at Belleville in the case of Prof. Whitton against H. Lennox, for skimming and diluting milk, alluded to by Mr. McCargar at the meeting of the cheese board here last week. It should be read by all furnishing factories with milk.

A few days ago a couple of individuals met in THE EXPRESS office and commenced an argument regarding cream and milk in the manufacture of cheese. One contended that much of what was in the bulletins lately sent out was all "fudge" and that cream would not make cheese ; that cream during the process of manufacture was carried away, the milk making the cheese. The other held that it was all-important that the cream be retained in the milk ; the quality of the cheese depending greatly upon the richness of the milk. Our dairy editor held to the latter opinion, but not considering himself sufficiently versed to give a decided view, submitted the question to Prof. Robertson, of the Agricultural College. Here is his reply :

DEAR SIR,—Your letter of enquiry of 18th inst. has been duly received.

When fat is removed from milk by skimming, or withheld by the keeping back of the strippings, two effects are at once noticeable in the cheese made from such milk. A larger quantity of milk is required to yield a pound of cheese ; and the cheese is of inferior quality. The fat of milk is present in the shape of small globules, held in suspension by the milk serum. When milk is set these globules rise to the top and mainly constitute the cream. When milk is coagulated for cheese making the curd encases the globules and holds them in its own body. A small per cent. of them escapes in the whey, being rubbed off the surface of the pieces of cut curd. Fine Canadian cheddar cheese has, at least 30 per cent. of its weight made up by these fat globules. You will thus see that when they are removed very much less cheese can be made from a given quantity of milk. The cheese will also be inferior in richness of body and flavor as the natural flavor of milk mainly resides in the fat. I am, yours truly,

JAS. W. ROBERTSON.

Why Baking Powders are Best.

(From Hall's Journal of Health)

Baking powders properly compounded and containing pure cream of tartar, are more convenient than yeast ; and bread and pastry made with them are just as wholesome and far more palatable.

We are in entire sympathy with the manufacturers of the Royal Baking Powder—who commenced and are vigorously conducting the war against the use of adulterated baking powders.

Before committing ourselves, however, we made tests of a sufficient number of baking powders to satisfy ourselves that the substitution of alum for cream of tartar in their composition had not been over-estimated, while a careful examination of the Royal Baking Powder confirms our belief that Dr. Mott, the government chemist, when he singled out and commended this powder for its wholesomeness did it wholly in the interests of the public.

We do not hesitate to say that the Royal Baking Powder people deserve the gratitude of the community whom they are endeavoring to protect.

CHAPTER XXII.—Mr. Beeching's Ultimatum.

Mr. Beeching took a hansom and drove to a street off Cavendish-square, a street well known to all the best dressed women in London. As he drove along he debated what he should do for Mrs. Baddeley. He was so inherently a man of business—albeit he had never soiled his fingers with the grime of a city office—that it irked him to fling a hundred pounds into this harpy's maw, as a sop is flung to Cerberus. It would please him better to make some kind of bargain with the harpy, even if the transaction should cost him more than a hundred pounds. He wanted to get some advantage for his money.

He sent his card to Mrs. Ponsonby, and was at once admitted into the very sanctuary of the house near Cavendish-square—the lady's private room, study, office, or boudoir, which ever she might prefer to call it; and here he was recieved with gracious smiles by Mrs. Ponsonby herself.

She needed no explanation of his errand, for she had seen him in attendance upon the handsome Mrs. Baddeley at race-meetings and other places of public resort, whither Mrs. Ponsonby went occasionally to see how the world was using her customers. It was there that she made up her mind about all her doubtful patronesses, as to how far they might be worthy of her confidence. That which she saw at Hurlingham or at Sandown served as the chart by which she steered in dangerous seas. In the dressmaker's estimation of Mrs. Baddeley—whose acount was a bagatelle compared with other accounts—Mr. Beeching was an important factor. He had never crossed her threshold until to-day, and she felt pleased with herself for having written the letter that had brought him there.

She was not so pleased, however, after a quarter of an hour's conversation with Mr. Beeching.

Of money on account he would not give her a sixpence. If she were prepared to settle her account upon equitable terms, say thirty-three per cent., he would give her his cheque and take Mrs. Baddeley a receipt in full of all demands. If she were not disposed to accept this offer, she must look to Mrs. Baddeley alone for her money. He would have nothing to do with it. He knew what dressmaker's bills were, and the usurious profits they exacted. He was assured that thirty-three per cent. would pay for all that she had supplied, and leave a margin of profit. At any rate that was his ultimatum. Mrs. Baddeley had given him plenary powers. As for the gowns for this evening, Mrs. Baddeley could do very well without them. It was by her acting, not by her costume she was to please her audience. It was not to be supposed that he was to be frightened into paying an exorbitant account.

Mrs. Ponsonby held out for a long time. She was not in the habit of compromising an account. She was in no immediate want of money. She meant to have her due. Mrs. Baddeley would be obliged to pay her.

"My good soul, it is all very well to talk," replied Mr. Beeching, who was more at his ease in a business interview than in think I would allow you to be unhappy for the sake of a paltry hundred?" said Beeching, tenderly. "Oh, Leonora, how little you know me."

This was a plunge. He had never called her Leonora before.

Tory gave a short indignant bark, either at Mr. Beeching's familiarity or at his mistress's neglect.

"I have done something more than you asked," continued Beeching, still more tenderly. "I have got you out of debt. You don't owe Mrs. Ponsonby a shilling. There is the old account, and there is the account for your new gowns, both receipted."

"You darling! How can I ever be grateful enough?" How can I ever repay you?"

"You might repay me easily, if you tried, Leonora. Show me a little of that favor which you lavish so freely upon your sister's lover. Give me some of those smiles you give to St. Austell. Let me be something more to you than a stop gap and a convenience. Leo, you know that I adore you."

He drew nearer to her, regardless of Tory, whose yellow eyes were shining ominously.

"You won't refuse me a kiss, Leo?"

"One! Half a dozen if you like."

He sprang to clasp her waist, to press those exquisite lips, and was met by a cold black muzzle, which touched him for an instant, and was withdrawn just as it widened into a growl, preliminary to a snap. Mrs. Baddeley had snatched up Tory. He was to her as Medusa's head was to Minerva, and almost as invincible.

"My dear Beeching, I hope your kindness in helping me out of a difficulty does not make you forget that I have a husband in India," she said with dignity, and Beeching stood before her, crestfallen and angry, but unable to reply.

He began to understand that he was to write cheques whenever they were urgently wanted, but that he was to get nothing but afternoon tea and Tory's attentions for his money.

"You are very cruel," he said, sulkily. "Good day."

You'll come to see the play, dear Beeching," she said, as he was departing.

"I'll be——if I do!"

"Oh, I hope you won't be that; but I know you'll come to see Peg Woffington.'

He met the milliner's basket and the young woman just emerging from the left. He had none of that generous glow which is said to follow the doing of a good action. He felt angry and savage at being foiled.

"The next time she's in a difficulty she may whistle for me," he said to himself; but when eight o'clock came he could no more keep away from the Victorian Hall than a moth can keep away from a candle. It was so near his chambers in the Albany. He had not even to order his brougham. He just slipped on his overcoat, took one from half a dozen guinea tickets on his chimneypiece and walked to the place of entertainment. Carriages were setting down at the entrance. Lady Belfield, Helen and Sir Adrian were going in just in front of him, amongst a fashionable crowd. His stall was next but one to Helen's, and St. Austell occupied the seat between them.

"How odd that we should be side by

"And you go from party to party—from crowd to crowd—alone?"

"What do you mean by alone? I am under my elder sister's wing, always."

"I don't think that wing is quite enough to shelter you, Helen, I don't like to think of you about in society without your husband."

"I should see very little of society if I waited for Valentine to take me about. Do you know that I should have gone out of my mind a few months ago—gone melancholy mad—if Leo had not come to my rescue?"

"That is very sad, Helen. I must talk to my brother——"

"Don't! It would only make bad blood between us. It is all over with us as a devoted couple; it was all over directly after our honeymoon. I was so fond of him, and I thought we were going to be so happy together—not commonplace married people, leading commonplace semi-attached lives, but wedded lovers. I very soon found out my mistake."

"But you have only been married two years. You cannot be tired of each other yet. Valentine is too much accustomed to have his own way, and to seek his own amusement; but I have no doubt he loves you as fondly as ever."

"You have not seen us together, or you would know better."

"I cannot believe that there is any change in his feelings," persisted Adrian; "but I think the kind of life you are leading is calculated to estrange him. The knowledge that you are going about in society without him will make him more and more careless of his home, more intent upon his own pleasures."

They were at Mrs. Baddeley's door by this time.

"Good night," said Helen, offering Adrian her hand.

He pressed it gently, with a brother's kindly grasp.

"We may meet again, perhaps, before morning. I saw Glandore at the Junior Carlton, and he asked me to look at her ladyship's party, and hear Patti."

"Au revoir, then," said Helen, with an undefinable feeling that Adrian's presence would spoil the evening.

He had told her that he did not approve of her butterfly life; and she could not shake of the idea that he could read her thoughts and knew the downward road on which she was travelling.

Lake Shipping.

The traffic upon the Great Lakes is enormous, the tonnage passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal is in excess of that making use of the Suez. During the last season of navigation seventy-three vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of over twenty thousands tons, and a value, with their cargoes, of two and a half millions, were cast away on these waters. What proportion of these disasters is due to the fact that neither the United States nor Canada have as yet made any attempt to prevent unseaworthy vessels from plying upon the lakes as freighters, or the overloading of any but passenger craft? The Inspector General of steam vessels on the Great Lakes for the United States, has reported to Congress that there is no law of the United States regulating the loading of lake vessels, and that his department in fixing a limit to the depth to which passenger steamers may be loaded down to, had gone beyond its legal powers. As a result of the "Victoria" and "Waubuno" disasters, both the engines and hulls of all Canadian passenger vessels on the great lakes are inspected, and the number of passengers they may carry is fixed

Baddeley would be obliged to pay her.

"My good soul, it is all very well to talk," replied Mr. Beeching, who was more at his ease in a business interview than in society; "but can you get blood out of a stone? Can you get nine hundred pounds out of an officer's wife—a lady whose husband is being roasted alive at Candahar or somewhere, in order to keep body and soul together. You have made your mistake in trusting a lady in Mrs. Baddeley's sad position, and you ought to think yourself uncommonly lucky if you get a clear third of your account, without law expenses or bother of any kind."

"Mrs. Baddeley may not have money, but she has friends," argued the dressmaker, doggedly.

"No doubt she has friends—hosts of friends—but I take it I am the only one among 'em who would pay six and eight pence in the pound to get her out of difficuty. One thing I can assure you, Mrs. Ponsonby, I won't pay seven shillings. I have made my final offer."

He had his cheque-book in the breast pocket of his summer overcoat, the end showing distinctly against the silk lining. He touched the book lightly as he spoke, and that touch decided Mrs. Ponsonby.

She had felt some uneasiness about Mrs. Baddeley's account, and it was something to get the cost price of her materials, with the credit of having dressed a lady who was known and admired in a particular set, and who had brought Mrs. Ponsonby a good deal of custom.

I should be sorry to disoblige a lady for whom I have a great liking," she said, with a patronising air; "and rather than do that I will accept your cheque."

"And give me a receipt in full of all demands?"

"Yes, so far as the account you have there. The gowns that are to be delivered this afternoon are not in that account."

"What are they to cost?"

Mrs. Ponsonby looked at a document on her Davenport.

"Seventy-seven pounds eighteen shillings and ninepence."

"I'll add thirty-five to your cheque, and you can cross Mrs. Baddeley out of your books altogether."

"What! I am to take a third of my account and to lose my customer?"

"Not at all. She says there is no one in London but you who can make her a gown. She will go on dealing with you I have no doubt; but if she takes my advice she will always pay ready money, and always know what she is going to pay when she gives the order. You'll both of you find the system ever so much pleasanter."

"Not if my prices are to be cut down in this way," replied Mrs. Ponsonby.

There was a further discussion, but Mr. Beeching's logic and his cheque-book prevailed. He wrote his cheque, got the two receipted accounts, saw the milliner's basket deposited on the top of a cab, with a young woman in charge of it, and then drove back to Wilkie Mansions. He passed the four-wheeler and the big basket before he reached the Park.

Mrs. Baddeley was in her drawing-room, pale, anxious, but lovely, in a Japanese tea-gown, lime-blossom green, under a cloud of coffee-coloured lace.

"Dearest Beeching, have you got me my gowns?" she gasped, with clasped hands as he stood just within the doorway.

Tory, always eager to distinguish himself, rushed at the half open door and banged it, and then came back to his mistress on his hind-legs to ask for his accustomed reward of biscuit or sugar, but Leo was too agitated to think of Tory.

"Your gowns will be here in ten minutes, I passed them on the road. Could you

Helen and Sir Adrian were going in just in front of him, amongst a fashionable crowd. His stall was next but one to Helen's, and St. Austell occupied the seat between them.

"How odd that we should be side by side," said his lordship, loud enough for Lady Belfield to hear.

Helen made no answer. She was not yet mistress of those arts of hyprocisy which enable a woman to glide from flirtation to flirtation, and from intrigue to intrigue, with a bold front and a lofty crest. She had not passed the border line of guilt, and yet her head was bent by the burden of conscious shame. That slight droop of the head, and languid pensive air enhanced her beauty, in an age when brazen mirthfulness is the commonest attitude of woman. She had a fragile look, like a tall white lily bent almost to breaking. Some of her friends said she looked consumptive and would not last many seasons.

She knew that St. Austell had taken infinite trouble to get that stall next to her's. He had been with her at tea-time to find out the number of her seat—had been with her, they two alone, in the Japanese drawing-room—without even a Tory to make a diversion from perilous sentimentality—and then driven off to the Hall in a hansom to get his own number exchanged; and now he expected her to act surprise.

"Masks and Faces" was listened to with politeness and appropriate applause by people who remembered Fanny Sterling in the heyday of her charms as Peg Woffington; by people who could hardly dissociate the character from Mrs. Bancroft, and by other people who had seen Mrs. Bernard Beere. As for Mrs. Baddeley, her diamonds and her gowns were lovely. Her acting was easy and refined, and utterly undramatic; but she was above the level of her fellow performers, and was supposed by them and by herself to be taking the town by storm. Applause is given so freely to amateurs, since approval means nothing and compromises nobody. People who have been coaxed into buying guinea stalls for an old familiar play, must at least pretend to enjoy themselves, and the audience was fashionable, and could console itself with the idea that it was the right thing to be there.

Lady Belfield and her daughter-in-law parted in the vestibule. Helen was going on to a party in Regent Terrace with her sister. She had to go to Mrs. Baddeley's dressing-room and wait there while that lady changed her dress, which would be rather a long business no doubt. St. Austell offered to take her to her sister's room, but Adrian gave her his arm, as if by a superior right.

"If you'll take care of my mother, I'll be back in a few minutes," he said to St. Austell, as he walked off with Helen.

It was the first time she had touched his arm since they were affianced lovers, and her fingers trembled faintly as they rested on his sleeve. She had so many causes for agitation that night. St. Austell's pursuit, unobtrusive, but fatal: her fear of her husband's return, which might occur at any moment; and now her dread of this grave, earnest brother-in-law, whom she had wronged in the past, and whom she shrank from in the present as from one who had an occult power to read her heart.

"You are looking pale and tired, Helen," said Adrian, as they went along a passage leading to the back of the Hall, "Must you really go to a party to-night?"

"I am due at two. There is Lady Glandore's musical evening, which I would not miss for worlds, and a dance afterwards—a late dance— which means coffee and carriages at six o'clock to-morrow morning."

"I believe you are killing yourself with this kind of life.

"Oh, but it is only a spurt: it lasts so short a time. 'A rose's brief bright life of joy,' as somebody has said."

As a result of the "Victoria" and "Waubuno" disasters, both the engines and hulls of all Canadian passenger vessels on the great lakes are inspected, and the number of passengers they may carry is fixed by competent authorities, so that in this respect Canada is in advance of the United States. Unfortunately, however, for the sailors, there is no Government inspection of the hulls of vessels engaged in carrying freight, nor is there any attempt at regulating the manner in which these vessels are loaded. The disinclination of the underwriters to insure a vessel that is so rotten as to be too great a risk, has, doubtless, a certain effect for good, but in many cases it simply drives unseaworthy vessels out of the hands of responsible shipowners into those of unscrupulous men, who may be clever enough to place the risk and make money out of the loss of the vessel. The tendency to overload even sound vessels upon the lakes, where for days together the water is as smooth as that of a mill pond, is very great, especially when rates are low. When a few hundred bushels extra makes all the difference between a profitable trip and a dead loss, the captain that will not run the risk of a "snorter" catching him is much more prudent than are the most of the lake men. When a craft, unseaworthy through lack of strength, sail area, or steam power, is sadly overloaded, it does not require very much of a gale to produce a disaster. A barge foundered in Lake Ontario a short time ago, which was simply a floating coffin, and within a few days a small schooner went down in the same lake within fifteen miles of her port of departure, having been fatally injured by merely touching the bottom. It is not wonderful, therefore, that the lake sailors should have asked Parliament to insist upon the inspection of hulls and rigging, boats and life preservers, and the establishment of a "Plimsoll's mark" on the great lakes. Mr. Foster, late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has, since Parliament adjourned, promised them a bill which will bring this about, and it is to be hoped that the Americans will take similar action.

The Beef-Eater are the Bosses.

The history of the whole world shows that the beef-eating peoples of the world are foremost in peace and war, art and science. That has been the history of our race, and will be to the end of recorded time. .... In Great Britain the average consumption of each individual was 105 pounds per annum, in France 74 pounds, in Germany 69 pounds, in Russia 48 pounds, in Italy 23 pounds, in Austria 64 pounds, in Spain 49 pounds, in Scandinavia 67 pounds, and in United States 120 pounds. In Great Britain the consumption annually was 105 pounds, and in the United States 120 pounds' so that the two great English-speaking peoples of the world, the foremost in empire and civilization, Great Britain and the United States, are the largest beef consumers of the nations upon the face of the earth

Looking for Something Choice.

"Eany good butter?" inquired an old lady of the grocer.

"There's never any flies on our butter, madam."

Then the old lady, whose knowledge of English is limited, said:

"Well, if flies won't eat it, 'taint good enough fer me," and she went across the way where only the choice brands are sold

BY E. H. S.

Thou secret of another world!
Tossed flaming from thy troubled rest;
Unerringly through darkness hurled
On this strange planet's syl an breast.
Pray tell me of thy silvery course,
Across the unending universe.
Didst hear the musick of the spheres,
Accompanying the chaunt of years?
Sad meteor in thy course through night,
Didst see the hosts arrayed in white?
The spectre dead of earth that hover
About it, whirling on through space;
Keeping for aye an equal pace,
Beneath night's murk, and day's blaze cover.
Hissing awhile with fury heat,
Soon cold thou growest at my feet;
Thy fiery hue is fading fast,
Thy strange unearthly look has passed,
The change grows more and more complete;
Now thou art black and cold at last.

Through thy swift passage through the sky,
Thou wast watched by a maiden's eye;
She watched thee from the dewy grove
And breathed a tender wish of love:
For Hylas was the gentle sigh,
And still she held her eyes above,
"You were not kind to him yestern,"
Said mystick memory in turn—
"He loves you still" the same voice said;
The maiden dropped her gentle head,
And held her white hand to her breast,
The fluttering heart that would not rest;
She whispered "would indeed that I
Had been more kind by being less shy;
By yonder blazing orb that fell,
I felt full more than I would tell;
I love poor Hylas all in all,
Oh would that he might hear me call;—
But hark! the clinging thicket stirred,
The woven branches broke asunder,
A voice said, "Sweet, I heard each word,
Nor fly away in timorous wonder.
My heart was sore and so I came
To be near thee and dream away
Into the night my piteous flame,
And only leave you to the day—
But oh, I love you, I was weary,
Confronted with my heart alone,
I did not mean to hear, when here I
Came wandering, but I heard you moan
And couldn't help what I have done—"
'Twas Hylas, and the beauteous maid
Blushed at the words that he had said,
Nor unto Hylas would she own,
The soft words spoken when alone.
But he had seen into her heart,
And seen it and had heard it speak;
Love taught him better far than art:
He only kissed her tender cheek.
Kisses draw love from where it lingers;
It shines in eyes and darts from fingers.

Thou silent meteor lying so,
Thy ebon night sky was thy bridge;
And little, little didst thou know
Thou came to be a lover's pledge.

But, ho, there was a sadder scene
Here in the sombre earth's demesne.
The little stars that brightly glitter,
The streaks of stars and myriads there,
That deckt the pale moon's golden litter,
Looked down upon a dead man's bier.
With burning, sunken, fevered eye,
The dying soldier swept the sky;
He thought again of war's and battle;
He heard again the drum's wild rattle.
Ere death we go back over life's story
And flush with its forgotten glory.
The moon shone, he gazed long at her,
As thou, swift-pinioned meteor
Flashed by, he gasped and dropped his head,
Whispering—"My Death Star," and was dead

Oh messenger from worlds unknown!
Traverser o' the skies alone!
Mysterious secret, tangible,
What is thy mute strange-hidden spell?
Herald of love and death!—Oh hold your
Hot wings of fire—Death to the soldier
That pillar like for a nation stood—
And love to children in the wood.

Summer Twilight.

BY J. R. WILKINSON

I sit at the twilight hour
Just where the roses sleep;
And the thoughts that come unto me
Are, oh! so calm and sweet.
I list for the sound of a footfall
I know will come to me,
At the golden glow of sunset,
When shadows steal o'er the sea.

And restful, and soul-refreshing
As dew to the drooping flower;
Inwardly invigorating,
Imparting new life and power.

A $60,000,000 W. W. Scheme.

The people of Paris, France, are discussing a scheme submitted by a Swiss engineer to the municipality for furnishing the city with an ample supply of drinking water from Lake Neufchatel, Switzerland, at a cost of $60,000,000. The distance between the lake of Neufchatel and Paris 312 miles, and the surface of the lake is 1,620 feet higher than the mean level of Paris, its total area covering 140 square miles. This vast body of water, even if it were not replenished, would be sufficient to supply Paris for two years at the rate of 133 gallons per head per day, the level of the lake falling no more than three feet, and the water would arrive in Paris at a temperature of 50 degrees Fahrenheit. It is not proposed to take the water from the surface of the lake, but to draw it off by an underground heading 262 feet below the surface of the lake, where it has a temperature of only 43 degrees. The water would be taken through a tunnel twenty-two miles long under the Jura Mountains to the Dessoubre valley, in the department of the Doubs, and thence in an arched conduit along the slopes of the hills to Paris, where it would arrive still at an elevation of 394 feet. As the present reservoirs of Paris have an elevation of only 295 feet, raising the fall, or pressure, by 100 feet, with a flow of 4,400 gallons per second, would give a tremendous motive power.

The Use of Spectacles.

A vast amount of popular misapprehension and prejudice exists as to the use of spectacles. Many persons who need them object to wearing them for various reasons. Some fear that it will lead their friends to suspect that they are getting old. Others think it will cause them to be suspected of wishing to appear learned or cultured. Some persons do not want to begin to wear them lest, having acquired the habit, they may not be able to leave them off or to see well without them. Others, again, object to glasses only on account of their inconvenience. I have personally met with many of all these classes of persons, but I have frequently heard of another class that I have never met with, namely, those who do not need glasses, but who wear them just for effect and to attract attention. Now, the simple truth is that there are just two good reasons for wearing spectacles, and only two. One is that we may see better, the other is that our eyes may be relieved of strain. Often both these reasons are combined in the same case.—Professor David Webster, M. D.

Eli Perkins Was Too Funny.

Eli Perkins, the humorist, was too humorous the other day. He wrote a letter to D. W. Caldwell, the general manager of the Nickel Plate railway line, asking for a pass to Chicago. Thinking to be funny he added this postscript:—"P. S. I enclose you $5—if you can find it." Mr. Caldwell is a generous but somewhat austere man. He answered the letter in due course of business, ostensibly granting the favour, but inclosing no pass. Here is the postscript he added to his reply: P. S. "I enclose you pass—if you can find it." Eli had been too funny.—Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

The Effect of Too Much Education.

"I understand you ran away from a polecat the other night," said Colonel Yerger to Sam Johnsing.

"Dat's jess what I did."

"With considerable alacrity, I suppose, when you learned the nature of the animal."

"No, sah, with contrifugal force, sah," replied Sam, who is attending a night school.

STATISTICS.

The great Montezuma irrigating tunnel, in Colorado, has been completed. This tunnel is over a mile long and runs under one of the ranges of the mountains composing the Rockies. With the fifty miles of canal, it will convey the water of the Dolores river over the richest agricultural valley in Colorado. Over 200,000 acres of land will be reclaimed by this enterprise.

The total mileage of pipes for natural gas in the United States is not far from 2,000 miles, not including small pipes for individual use. One-fifth of this quantity of pipes is laid in the city of Pittsburg. The gas wells of Pennsylvania produce from 1,500,000 to 15,000,000 cubic feet a day. High and low pressure wells are also found in Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, and as far west as Kansas. The total consumption of gas for 1887, as estimated by coal displacement, was equivalent to 10,000,000 tons of coal.

The Mississippi river is again on the rampage. Its great volume of water, swollen by the immense floods pouring down from its headwater tributaries in Minnesota and Wisconsin, is overflowing its banks and breaking through its levees, carrying widespread destruction in its course. That long, narrow valley, known as the Sny bottoms, lying between the river and the bluffs, a strip fifty miles by five of the richest land in the world except, perhaps, the Valley of the Nile, is now a lake, its crops destroyed, its hopeless and homeless people flying to the highlands, a million dollars' worth of crops upon which they depended for their coming year's sustenance ruined.

New York World:—The number of Americans going to Europe this year is greater than ever before. The Atlantic steamship companies are having all they can attend to, and could make use of many more vessels than they own. It is becoming, more and more clear that there is a brilliant future in store for Europe as an American summer resort. Though we have a population now of but 60,000,000 people, we already largely support the inhabitants of many interesting localities in the effete monarchies. By the time we reach 200,000,000 it can readily be understood that the energies of the Europeans will be mainly devoted to securing a living through making it pleasant for us over there during our pleasure tours and sojourns for health.

A recent dispatch from London says: "Russia is beginning to be regarded with particular suspicion. The latest reports say that she now has three corps of armed men on her western frontier. She has recently strengthened her navy and during the last month has shown a change in activity in the way of military preparation. It is now noted that Russia has a better opportunity for raiding the East than she has had for years. Germany is sorely troubled by the uncertain condition of the Emperor. England is unprepared for war, and has home-rule divisions at home to prevent harmonious action against swift aggressive action on the part of Russia towards the East. Germany has, through Bismarck, shown such conciliatory tendencies towards the Czar that Russia regards that country as good as neutral. Austria it does not care for, France is now an ally, Russian finances are at their worst, and might be remedied by the capture of a new territory. Outbreaks and insurrections are constantly being fomented by Russian agents in the East. It is believed here that Russia intends within the next month to make a positive showing of an aggressive Eastern policy. In financial circles great uneasiness is beginning to be felt.

Imparting new life and power.
And thus removed from the turmoil
Of day, with its din and strife;
I listen in calm contentment
To the hum of insect life.

And the songs I hear in the branches,
Just stirred by the wandering breeze;
A concert of birdling music
Thrilling my heart's glad ease.
The silvery, mystic moonlight
Enfoldeth the earth and sea;
And the summer night is throbbing
In nature's harmony.

O, sun, and sea, and shadow;
O, eve, with thy soft twilight;
I revel amid your splendor,
Enwrapt in deep delight.
Aleene, I await thy coming,
And the clasp of thy gentle hand;
To wander in blissful dreaming

The Vehicle of Thought.

BY WILL T. JAMES.

As music floats upon the air
In undulating waves of sound,
So thoughts of savants swell and bear
Their import all the world around,
Launched with a mythic mercury's flight
Upon Illiteracy's dark night.

As knowledge in her chariot rides
Across the sable wilderness
Of Error, like a mist divides
Man's mental chaos, and the press—
The car in which she onward sweeps—
O'er bigot-builded barriers leap.

Gleaming with fire, its golden wheels
Reflect the splendor of the sun
Of Truth althwart a world that feels
Their emanations as they run,
Rejoicing as its fulgent glow
The paths of wisdom clearly show.

Each gilded spoke in brightness turns,
Diffusing radiance o'er the land;
While they o'ershadow him who spurns,
They crown with halos Caxton's band,
Adding more lustre to the name
Of him whose talents merit fame.

Speed on triumphant, ever fraught
With treasures rich as earth's best gem
Men but assimilate the thought
To wear the scholar's diadem.
Beneficence no more could bless
Mankind than with a pure, free press

He Knew What a Mountain Was.

It was in a Tar Flat school a week or two ago. The school teacher was worming the usual kind and amount of information out of the boys. At length she asked the question:

"What is a mountain?"

That seemed to stump the class for a minute. Finally a little hand was timidly held up.

"Well, do you know what a mountain is?"

"I guess I know."

"What is it?"

"It is a lot o' land pointin' up in the air."

In this century the population of London has increased fourfold and its area about fifteenfold. Every year some 70,000 fresh souls are added to the population by immigration or birth. Every ten years there is added to London by immigration alone the population of a city as large as Lisbon or Bristol; and by immigration and birth together there is added a population as large as that of St. Petersburg or Vienna.

She Thought So, Too.

"I think," said the minister, who was visiting a parishioner, "that it is easier to coax children than to drive them. Gentle words are more effective than harsh ones."

"I think so, too," said the lady tenderly. Then she raised her window and suddenly shouted to her boy; "Johnnie, if you don't come in out of that mud-puddle I'll break your back.

Giving Up a Career.

"I'm goin' to be a soldier, ma, when I grow up," said Bobby, as he crawled into bed, "and fight in wars and battles."

"All right, Bobby; now go to sleep."

In the morning she shook him for the fourth time and said;

"Bobby, you must get up; the idea of a soldier lying abed at this hour!"

"Well, ma," said Bobby, sleepily. "I've changed my mind about being a soldier."

The Air Better than the Words.

As the last note of "Comin' through the Rye" trembled on the air, she turned to her escort and said:

"Is it not exquisite, Col. Blood?"

"Ye-es," assented the Colonel, in a half-hearted tone of voice, "the air is fine, but down our way, Miss Breezy, we go in more for Bourbon, you know."

A curious sight was to see in Boston the other day during the rain a wet umbrella leaning against the wall outside a railway office. A country visitor did not wish to carry the dripping head protector within the precincts of the office, and there it remained for fully a half hour without molestation. Hundreds were the questive glances cast at the tempting article, and occasionally some pedestrian unsupplied with such protection would advance a step or two toward it, but would then draw back and go his way, evidently thinking it was a trap. Had the countryman left it inside the door, or in any less prominent place, it would undoubtedly have disappeared almost immediately upon leaving his hand, but there it was secure, and has probably settled the vexed question as to the safest place to leave an umbrella.

of an aggressive Eastern policy. In financial circles great uneasiness is beginning to be felt.

In a recent lecture in London, England, Mr. T. D. Mocatti gave some interesting details respecting the present number of Jews in the world, and their distribution. He estimated their whole number as between 8,000,000 and 10,000,000. Of these about 100,000 are found in the United Kingdom, seven-tenths of them living in London, Germany contains 600,000; France, 70,000; America, 500,000; Persia, from 40,000 to 50,000. Large numbers of them dwell in Northern Africa and Abyssinia, and there has been a large influx of Jews to Palestine during the present century from other parts of the Turkish dominions, and from Poland, Russia and Central Europe. The Turkish government shows entire toleration towards them, but is not favourable to their further immigration. Mr. Mocatti says the condition of the Jews in the Holy Land is not a happy one. There is but little outlet for their energies. A large number give themselves entirely up to Hebrew study, while the bulk of them eke out a miserable livelihood by small industries, apparently aided, but in reality intensified in pauperism, by the pernicious system of "Halukah" or distribution of alms sent from various countries, which are doled out among the Jewish population in small sums.

A Useful Invention.

A Prairie avenue inventor, who has six daughters, has applied for a patent on a parlour alarm clock. His application reads thus:—"What I claim is the combination and arrangement of the various cams, levers and gongs, in conjunction with wires, batteries and explosives, whereby the clock is made to sound a loud and distinct warning at 11 p.m., and at the end of five minutes thereafter to explode a charge of dynamite on the under side of the seat of each and every occupied chair in the room, substantially as and for the purposes set forth."—[Chicago Tribune,

Activity is the price of strength. Tie your arm tight to your side, giving it no motion, and its strength will flee away from the conquering palsy. The oak, that king of trees, girds itself with giant might because it is full of activity; energy runs through a thousand roots gathering the strength of the soil and building it into the heart of the oak; activity runs through a million leaves and gathers the commerce of the air and the sunlight to enrich the strength of the magnificent giant. Man no less must be full of bustling, busy activity, else he cannot be strong in the years of life nor staunch in the tests of manhood.

NUTTIE'S FATHER.

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—NUTTIE'S KNIGHT.

"The night came on and the bairnies grat,
Their minnie aneath the mools heard that."

"LINDHURST, 4th July.—Philip Dutton to Miss Egremont. Found. Waterloo, 6.15."

"I knew he would," said Nuttie, with a strange quietness, but as she tried to read it to her father her voice choked, and she had to hand it to Annaple. But for the first time in her life she went up and voluntarily kissed her father's forehead. And perhaps it was for the first time in his life that the exclamation broke from him, "Thank God!"

Perhaps it was well that the telegram had not come earlier in the day, for Mr. Egremont was very restless, showing himself much shaken in nerves and spirits before the time for driving to the station, which he greatly antedated. Nuttie could hardly keep him in the carriage, and indeed had to persuade him to return thither, when he had once sprung out on the arrival of a wrong train.

And after all, when the train did come his blue spectacles were directed to the row of doors at the other end, and Nuttie was anxiously trying to save him from being jostled, when a voice said "Here!" and close beside them stood Mr. Dutton, with a little boy close by his side who looked up in her face and said "Sister!" It was said in a dreamy, almost puzzled way, not with the ecstatic joy Nuttie had figured to herself; and there was something passive in the mode of his hearing his father's "My boy, my boy!" Instinctively all turned to the harbour of the carriage; Mr. Dutton lifted Alwyn in, and as Nuttie received him, a pang shot across her, as she felt how light, how bony the little frame had become in these three weeks.

"Come in! Come back with us! Tell us all!" said Mr. Egremont, as Mr. Dutton was about to help him in.

"My dog," said Mr. Dutton, while Alwyn looked up from nestling in Nuttie's lap to say, "Mithter Button come. And Mothu!"

"We have room for him," said Mr. Egremont graciously. "Here, poor fellow."

"He has the right," said Mr. Dutton, "for he was the real finder."

And Monsieur, curly and shiny, occupied with great dignity the back seat beside his master, while Alwyn, in a silent but dreamy content, as if he only half understood where he was, rested against his sister's bosom with his hands in his father's.

"Come, old chap," said his father cheerily, "tell us all about it."

But Alwyn only shuddered a little, raised his eyelids slightly, and gave a tiny faint smile.

"I think he is very much afraid," said Mrs. Dutton. There was a good deal to be done to make him presentable this morning. You must forgive me for sacrificing his curls, there was nothing else to be done with them."

"Ah!" and Nuttie looked again. The boy was in a new, rather coarse, ready-made, sailor suit that hung loosely upon his little limbs, his hair was short, and he was very pale, the delicate rosy flush was quite gone, and with it the round outline of the soft cheek; and there were purple marks under the languid eyes. She bent down and kissed him saying, "Was Mr. Dutton nurse to you, Wynnie?"

He smiled again and murmured, "Mr. Dutton made me boy a ain."

After a question and answer or two

"Yes," said Mr. Dutton; "I verily believe we might have missed one another, but Monsieur ran up to him and, as I was actually whistling him off, I heard a little voice say, 'Mothu! Mothu!' and saw they were—well, embracing one another, and then came 'Mithter Button, Mithter Button, oh, take me home!'"

Eager caressing hands were held out to Monsieur, who jumped off the seat to receive the pats and laudations lavished on his curly round pate, and had to be reduced to order before Mr. Dutton could answer the question whether he had any further difficulty or danger.

"I took him up in my arms, and a handsome truculent-looking woman burst out on me, demanding what I was about with her caild. To which I answered that she knew very well he was no such thing. Her man came swaggering up, declaring impudently that I had better be off—but I believe he saw that the people who came round would not take his part, for he gave in much more easily than I expected. I explained as loud as I could that this was a gentleman's son who had been stolen from his nurse in the Park. The man began to protest that they had found him deserted, and taken him with them out of charity, requesting to be paid for his keep. So I thought it better to give them a sovereign at once, so as to have no further trouble, and get him away as fast as I could. The woman came after me, making further demands, but the sight of a policeman in the distance turned her back. I went up to him and explained. I found he knew all about the loss and the reward, and looked regretfully at my prize. We went back to the hotel, where I saw Alwyn to rights as well as I could, sent out for some clothes, such as the place would produce, and which at least, as he says, made a boy of him again. I'm afraid the process was rather trying from such unaccustomed hands, though he was very good, and he has been asleep almost all the way home, and, his senses all as in a dream bound up."

The heaviness—whether weariness or content, still continued. Alwyn seemed to find it too much trouble to talk, and only gave little smiles, more like his mother than himself. He clung quite desperately to his sister when Mark offered to lift him from the carriage, but nurse was close behind, and it was good to see the little arms stretched out, and the head laid on her shoulder, the hand put up to stroke her cheek, and the lips whispering "Wyn's own nursie." The jubilant greeting and triumphant procession with which he was borne upstairs seemed almost to oppress him. He appeared almost as if he was afraid of wakening from a happy dream, and his lively merriment seemed all gone; there were only beams of recognition and gladness at "Wyn's own nursery," "Wyn's own pretty cup," touching it as if to make sure it was real, and pleased to see the twisted crusts, his special treat.

But he could not eat much of them, and soon laid his head down as one weary, with the exhaustion of content; and nurse, who had allowed that Mr. Dutton had, considering all things, done much for the outward restoration of the daintiness of her recovered child, was impatient to give him the hot bath and night's rest that was to bring back the bright joyous Alwyn. So Nuttie only lingered for those evening prayers she had yearned after so sorely. When she held his mother's picture to him to be kissed, he raised his eyes to her and said: "Will she come to me at night now?"

"Who, my darling?"

"She, mother dear."

"Here's her picture, dear boy."

"Not only the picture—she came out of it[illegible]

the dining-room door was shut. "I must feast my eyes on him.

Annaple replied by throwing an arm round her and looking into her eyes, kissing her on each cheek, and then, as they reached the landing in the summer twilight, waltzing round and round that narrow space with her.

"You ridiculous person!" said Nuttie. "Do you mean that you saw!"

"Of course I did; I've seen ever so——"

"Nonsense! That's impossible——"

"Impossible to owls and bats perhaps, but to nothing else not to see that there was one sole and single hero in the world to you, and that to him there was one single being in the world; and that being the case——"

"But, Annaple, you can't guess what he has always been to me."

"Oh! don't I know?—a sort of Archbishop of Canterbury and George Heriot rolled into one. So much the more reason, my dear, I don't know when I've been so glad in my life than that your good times should be coming."

"They are come in knowing this! It is only too wonderful," said Nuttie, as they stood together among the plants in the little conservatory on the way upstairs. I always thought it insulting to him when they teased me about him."

"They did, did they?"

"My father, incited by poor Gregorio. Oh, Annaple! don't let any one guess till we know how my father will take it. What is it, Ellen?" as the nursery-maid appeared on the stairs.

"If you please, ma'am, Mrs. Poole would be glad if you are coming up to the nursery."

They both hastened up and nurse came out to meet them in the day nursery, making a sign to Ellen to take her place by the cot, and withholding the two ladies. She made them come as far off as possible, and then said that she was not at all satisfied about Master Alwyn. There had been the same drowsiness and disinclination to speak, and when she had undressed and washed him, he had seemed tender all over, and cried out and moaned as if her touch hurt him, especially on one side where, she felt convinced, there was some injury; but when she asked about it his eyes grew frightened and bewildered, and he only cried in a feeble sort of way, as if sobs gave him pain.

She had soothed him, and he had gone into his own bed with the same gentle languid gladness, but had presently begun moaning, and imploring in his sleep, wakening with screams and entreaties, "Oh, I'll do it! I'll try" and she thought him very feverish. Would it not be better that a doctor should see him?

Nurse was always an alarmist, and Nuttie could not help thinking that to wake the child to see a stranger to-night would only add to his terror and distress, while Annaple declared her entire belief that though no doubt the poor little fellow had been cruelly knocked about and bruised, a night's rest would probably restore his bright self, and make all that was past only like a bad dream. There was no judging to-night, and sleep was wonderful reparation to those little beings.

Then however the moans and murmurs began again, and now the awakening cry. They started forward, and as Nuttie came to the cot-side the child threw himself into her bosom with, "Sister! Sister! It is sister!" but his eyes grew round with terror at sight of Annaple, and clinging tightly to Nuttie, he gasped, "Send her away! don't let her touch me! Fan's not here!"

To tell him she was Cousin Annaple, Billy's mamma, had no effect; he did not seem able to understand, and she could only retire—

Dutton nurse to you, Wynnie?"

He smiled again and murmured, "Mr. Dutton made me boy a ain."

After a question and answer or two as to main facts of place and time of the discovery, Mr. Dutton told his story. "I did not effect much with my inquiries after the circuses. All I heard of were of too superior an order for kidnapping practices However, I thought the only way would be to haunt fairs and races, and look at their camp followers. At a place in Hertfordshire I saw a performance advertised with several children as fairies, so I went to see it. I was soon satisfied that Alwyn was not there; but it struck me that I had known the face of the prime hero, a fine handsome supple fellow, who was called in the programme Herr Adalbert Steinfuggen, or some such name. Well, it seemed that he knew me, for as I struggled out after a considerable interval, I heard myself accosted, 'Mr. Dutton! Sir, surely have the honor of speaking to Mr. Dutton of Micklethwayte?' I assure you he was the very pink of politeness. Do you remember, Miss Egremont, Abel Stone?"

"Oh, Abel Stone! He was a choir boy at Micklethwayte, I remember! He was very handsome, and had a splendid voice; but he was a real monkey for mischief; and nobody could manage him but mother. She was always pleading that he should not be turned out, and at last he ran away.'

"Yes; he went off with a circus, and there he found his vocation, rose and throve, married the prima donna, and is part owner. He seems very respectable, and was so friendly and affectionate that I ventured to consult him; when on hearing whom I was seeking, he became warmly interested, and gave me just the information I wanted. He said he had little doubt that Funny Frank was a clown called Brag, with whom he had had words some years back for misusing the children. He said he did not hold with harshness to the little ones in teaching them to do the feats, which certainly were wonderful. If they were frightened, they were nervous and met with accidents; but make much of them, and they thought it all fun, and took a pleasure in their performances. However this Brag, though a clever fellow, could not be hindered from bullying, and at last he went off with a girl of the troupe and set up on their own account. Stone, or whatever he pleases to call himself, had met them several times, but he spoke of them with great contempt as "low," and they did not frequent the same places as he does. However, he referred to one of his men, and found that they had been at Epsom on the Derby day, and moreover, that there was a report of them having lately narrowly escaped being in a scrape about a child who had been injured. There was no scruple as to advising me where to look for them, or as to the best means of detection. Stone was very indignant, and made me understand that all his young people were either to the manner born, or willingly hired out by their parents. I saw them in private life, and they looked happy and well fed, but that was no guarantee for Funny Frank. Well, I followed him up without success, trying each place Stone had set down for me, till I came last night to Lyndhurst, a very pretty place in the New Forest, where there is to be a fair tomorrow, beginning this afternoon. Stone advised me to look about before the affair opened, while unpacking and arranging was going on. Well, after all, it was very simple. I strolled out with my dog round the field where the vans and booths were getting into order. There was what I thought a little girl in a faded red petticoat sitting on the steps at the bottom of a yellow van with her head on her hands."

"That was me," said Alwyn, lighting up. "And Mothu came and kissed Fan!"

"Who, my darling?"

"She, mother dear."

"Here's her picture, dear boy."

"Not only the picture - she came out of it, when I cried, up on the nasty-smelling bundle in the van all in the dark."

"She came?"

"Yes, she came, and made it so nice, and hushed me. I wasn't afraid to go to by-by when she came. And she sang. Sister, can't you sing like that?"

"Not here, I'm afraid, dear, dear boy," she whispered, holding him so tight that he gave a little cry of "It hurts." Then came the prayers, not a word forgotten, and the little voice joined in her murmured thanksgiving for bringing him home.

She was much moved and awe-stricken at these words of her little brother; but she had to dress in haste for dinner, listening the while to her maids rejoinings and vituperatious of the wretches who had maltreated the child.

When she came down she found no one in the drawing-room but Mr. Dutton, whom her father had asked to the happiest meal that had perhaps ever been eaten in that house.

She went towards him with winged steps in her white dress: "Oh! Mr. Dutton, we have not said half enough to you, but we never, never can."

He gave a curious, trembling half smile, as she held out her hand to him, and said: "The joy is great in itself," speaking in a very low voice.

"Oh! I am so glad that you did it,' cried Ursula, "It would not have been half so sweet to owe it to anyone else."

"Miss Egremont, do you know what you are saying?" he exclaimed.

"Don't call me Miss Egremont! You never used to. Why should you?"

"I have not dared ——" he began.

"Dared! Don't you know you always were our own Mr. Dtton——best, wisest friend of all, and now more than ever."

"Stay," he said, "I cannot allow you in your fervour to say such things to me, unaware of the strength of feeling you are stirring within me."

"You! you! Mr. Dutton!" cried Nuttie, with a moment's recoil. "You don't mean that you care for me."

"I know it is preposterous——" he began.

"Preposterous! Yes, that you should care one bit for silly, foolish, naughty, self-willed me. Oh, Mr. Dutton, you can't mean it!"

"Indeed, I would have kept silence and not disturbed you with my presumption, if——"

"Hush!" she cried. "Why, it makes me so glad and so proud, I don't know what to do. I didn't think anybody was good enough for you—unless, it was dear, dear mother—and that it should be me."

"It is true," he said gravely, "my younger days were spent in a vain dream of that angel, then when all was ended, I thought such were not for me; but the old feeling has wakened, it seems to me in greater force than ever, though I meant to have kept it under control——"

"Oh, I am glad you didn't! It seems as if the world swam round with happiness," and she held his hand as if to steady herself, starting however as Annaple opened the door saying, "We've been sending telegrams with the good news."

Then an arch light came into her bright eyes, but the others were behind her, and she said no more.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—Found and Taken

"The angels of the gateway
Bent softly to the child,
And stretched glad hands t take him
To the kingdom undefiled."—B. M.

"Come up and see him," said Nuttie, as touch me! Fan's not here!"

To tell him she was Cousin Annaple, Billy's mamma, had no effect; he did not seem able to understand, and she could only retire—nurse being thus convinced that to let him see another stranger to-night would only do further harm. Nuttie and nurse succeeded in reassuring him that he was safe at home and with them, and in hushing him off into what they hoped would be a quiet wholesome sleep in spite of the hot sultry night, on which Annaple laid a good deal of the blame of his restlessness and feverishness.

Nuttie only came down for a short time before the visitors went away; and then she wrote a note to Dr. Brownlow, which Mark promised to leave as he went to the city in the morning, Mr. Egremont, in his present relief, pooh poohing all fears, and backing up Annaple's belief in the powers of "tired nature's soft restorer"; but Mr. Dutton looked grave and said that he had remarked the extreme tenderness, but had hoped that much was due to his own inexperience in handling little children. The parting clasp of the hand had a world of meaning in it, and Nuttie openly said that she hoped to tell him after matins at St. Michael's how the boy was. But she could not be there. When she went upstairs at night the half delirious terrors had returned, and there was another difficult soothing and comforting before the child slept again. Nurse fancied the unwonted presence might disturb him, and insisted on her going to her own room.

Easily Discouraged.

"Yes," said a base ball man, "I'm discouraged, and have given up the business forever. Why, the very first game they got onto me in the second inning, and pounded me all over the field."

"That ought not to discourage you. Many a pitcher has had similar luck."

"Yes, but I wasn't the pitcher; I was the umpire."

Red, white, and blue is the favorite color combination for lawn tennis suits.

Madame Patti, according to her own statement, received $10,500 as her share of the receipts of her first concert in Buenos Ayres in April last. The services of Theodore Thomas and his orchestra of sixty musicians can be secured for a single concert for $3,000. Yet there is more educational value in one concert given by Thomas's orchestra than in a score of concerts at which Patti is the star, and as is generally the case at her concerts, the only competent artist. The comparison is an instructive commentary on the state of musical culture of the present day.

HOUSEHOLD.

Family Mending.

DARNING, PATCHING, REPAIRING AND MAKING OVER.

The mother of a family appreciates the full force of the homely proverb, "A stitch in time saves nine." Many times nine are saved by prompt attention to repairs, and the greatest help to making is mending. Family mending consists of darning, patching, repairing and making over.

To darn well, select the number of thread or silk best suited to the material, and use the finest needle that will carry it. The edges of splits and tears must first be caught lightly together with long basting stitches that can easily be cut and drawn out when the darning is done. This prevents one edge stretching more than the other. Run the needle from the darner in very small stitches in and out its whole length before drawing through; then towards the darner in the same way, and so on, backwards and forwards till the length of the tear is covered. Tears are apt to be three cornered. Begin such in the center to make the point fit even, and darn towards each end. All darning of this character is done in the same way, but the finer the material the finer must be the needle and cotton.

In darning much worn material, baste under the split a piece of the same goods and darn the two together. In all cases it strengthens to darn upon another piece but does not make so smooth a darn. A ragged tear must have always a piece put under it. Ravellings of the same are best for darning flannels or dress goods, and if the mend is dampened and pressed with a hot iron it is almost unnoticeable. Tears in cloth darned upon the wrong side, the stitches run upon the surface, not going through, scarcely show upon the right side. In lined articles the darning must, of course, be done upon the right side.

All tears must be darned before washing. If the edges are once stiffened by wetting and drying they can never be mended neatly.

To darn a hole in a stocking begin with as long, a strand of cotton as can be easily managed, and a long, slim needle. Pass the needle back and forth across one way, letting each long stitch lie close to the one next it, and running the needle a little beyond the edge of the hole for greater strength, being careful not to draw the cotton tight enough to pucker. When the hole is covered, cross the other way, taking on the needle every other stitch of those in the first crossing. When finished you have a neat, strong basket work; neither a wide checker work than can be seen through, nor a thick, uneven surface that hurts the foot. After mending the holes the thin places in stockings should be run thickly, backwards and forwards with needle and cotton to prevent breaking. In darning toes and heels it is helpful to darn upon a china egg, but in other parts of the stocking a flatter darn is made by using only the hand. To darn woolen stockings wool must be used. For cotton stockings a French darning cotton, that comes in small, soft balls, is superior to that bought upon cards. It runs through several numbers, is fine and smooth, and keeps its color well.

Holes in garments or house-linen must be patched. To patch, baste a square of the same material under the hole, cut the edges of the hole even, turn under, and hem in small stitches neatly down to the patch. Then turn the edges of the patch and hem down upon the garment. This finishes both sides neatly. If the garment patched is figured or striped, the figures and stripes of caraway seed; roll out, cut and sift with sugar; bake in a quick oven.

OATMEAL COOKIES.—One cup of sugar, two eggs, one cup of flour, one cup of cold boiled oatmeal, one teaspoon of soda, two teaspoons of cream tartar, one tablespoon of butter; roll thin and bake in a quick oven.

SMOTHERED RICE.—Boil for ten minutes one cup of cold boiled chicken chopped fine, two cups of cold boiled rice and one cup of chicken broth, seasoned with salt, pepper and butter.

CRUMB PUDDING.—One quart of sweet milk, one pint of bread crumbs, three-quarters of a cup of sugar, yolks of four eggs, butter size of an egg, flavor with lemon; bake in a slow oven; when done spread over a layer of jelly, whip the whites of the eggs to a froth, add one cup of powdered sugar, pour over the jelly and bake a light brown.

ORANGE PUDDING.—Put in a baking dish three sweet oranges pealed and sliced; pour over one cup of sugar, one pint of milk yolks of three eggs, one tablespoon of corn starch boiled until thick. Whip the whites pour over the top and set in the oven to stiffen.

CORNSTARCH CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one-fourth cup of butter, one-half cup of milk, two thirds of a cup of cornstarch, one cup of flour, two eggs, one teaspoonful of baking powder.

GINGERBREAD.—One cup of molasses, one-half cup of brown sugar, one-fourth of a cup of butter, one cup of sour milk, one egg, one teaspoon each of cream tartar, soda, ground ginger and cinnamon, flour enough to make a medium batter.

SPICE CAKE.—One cup of butter, one and one-half cups of sugar, two cups of flour, one cup of raisins, one and one-half teaspoons of baking powder, two eggs, one and one-half teaspoons each of cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg.

SLICED APPLE PIE.—Line pie-pan or plate with crust, sprinkle with sugar, fill with tart apples, sliced very thin, sprinkle sugar and a very little cinnamon over them, and add a few small bits of butter and a tablespoonful of water, dredge in flour, cover with the top crust and bake about three-quarters of an hour; allow four or five tablespoonfuls of sugar to each pie.

BLANQUETTE OF VEAL.—Cut three pounds of the breast of veal in pieces two inches square, put them in enough cold water to cover them, with one saltspoonful of white pepper, one teaspoonful of salt, a bunch of sweet herbs, half a carrot scraped, a turnip peeled, and an onion stuck with three cloves; bring slowly to a boil, skim carefully till no more scum rises, and cook gently for thirty or forty minutes until the veal is tender; then drain it, returning the broth to the fire. Meantime make a white sauce by stirring together over the fire one ounce of butter and one ounce of flour until they are smooth, then adding a pint and a half of the broth gradually; season with a little more salt and pepper and a quarter of saltsooonful of grated nutmeg; when the sauce has boiled up well stir into it with an egg; whip the yolks of two raw eggs, put in the meat and cook for five minutes, stirring occasionally.

FRIZZLED BEEF.—Shave very thin half a pound of dried beef. Melt one large tablespoonful of butter in a frying pan, add the meat, stir over the fire about two minutes, or until the butter begins to brown; dredge in a little flour, stir again, add half a pint of milk, a very little pepper, and stir till it boils. Add the beaten yolk of one egg just as you take from the fire. Serve immediately.

THE MISERIES OF MISERS.

Some Remarkable Men Who Regarded Wealth Above all Physical Comforts.

Perhaps the most famous miser that ever lived was John Elwes, an Englishmar, who died from neglect because he refused to incur the expense of physicians and nurses, though worth not less than $4,000,000. In the case of John Elwes, his sordid character was not the result of ignorance for he was a graduate of a Swiss university and later in life was a member of Parliament. His greed of gold was an hereditary sin. He was a son of a London brewer, who died when the boy was only four years old. His mother survived, but to such an extent did her passion for money gain a hold upon her that, though she had $500,000 in her own right, she actually starved to death. An uncle, Sir Marvey Elwes, was also a miser, and the example of these two blood relatives exercised such an influence upon John Elwes that he became the most famous miser of three centuries. After his return to England from Geneva Elwes moved in fashionable London society, where his prospective wealth entitled him to recognition.

When he visited his uncle in Suffolk, where the latter lived in most abject penury, his hopeful nephew would play a double part. He would wear his fashionable garments as far as a little inn in Chelmsford, where he exchanged them for a pair of patched trousers, a worn out coat, darned stockings, and clodhopper shoes with iron buckles. In this attire he would call upon his uncle. The latter would not permit a fire on cold March days on the score of its being extravagant, and the two would sit with a crust of bread and one glass of wine between them until it was too dark to see each other's faces, and then they would retire to save the expense of candles. When this uncle died he left his nephew a fortune of $1,000,000.

As he grew older John Elwes developed the terrible avarice that marked his life by a passion for cards. He would sit in his threadbare clothes with the Duke of Northumberland and play with feverish eye and trembling hand with thousands at stake, and then after having lost or won as the case might be, he would walk to his miserable lodgings, three miles distant, in a peltering rain rather than pay for a cab.

Elwes owned a magnificent country seat in Berkshire. When he would leave London to visit it he would put three hard boiled eggs in his pockets, then mounting a horse would ride over fields and through lanes, going miles out of his way to avoid roads where he would have to pay a few pennies toll. A more than faithful biographer says of him:

"He would eat his provisions in the last stage of putrefaction rather than have a fresh joint from the butcher, and at one time he wore a wig about a fortnight which he picked out of a rut in a lane, and which had apparently been thrown away by a beggar."

At his country seat he allowed of no repair a save little brown paper and a bit of broken glass. During the harvest he would amuse himself with going into the fields to glean the corn on the ground of his own tenants, and they used to leave a little more than common to please the old gentleman, who was as eager after it as any pauper in the parish. To save bed coverings, before his death, he would go to sleep completely dressed with boots and hat on. He died miserable, his mind weakened by worry and privation. The value of his fortune, which went to two sons, was not less than $4,000,000.

Another celebrated miser was Ephraim Lapes Pereira, Baron d' Aguilar, formerly cashier of the Empress Maria Theresa, of Austria. Strange to say, the early years of small stitches neatly down to the patch. Then turn the edges of the patch and hem down upon the garment. This finishes both sides neatly. If the garment patched is figured or striped, the figures and stripes must be made to match in putting in the patch. Cloth is too heavy usually to turn the edges in patching. The edges of the patch must be run in small stitches upon the wrong side and the edge of the hole darned down closely on the right side.

The Boys.

Don't make the mistake of thinking that "anything will do for the boys!" Upon what is done for your boys depends their life-long habits and career. With a small, dark room, dull carpet, hard bed and all the old furniture, what boy can be taught the pleasures of owning nice things, and the importance of keeping them in order? Give the boys equal advantage with your girls. Coax them to stay at home with good books and periodicals, pictures, ornaments and comforts in their sleeping rooms, have their "chums" come to dinner frequently, invite their girl friends often, and treat them with great politeness at all times. A wise mother, well known to us, puts little lunches for her boys in their room when they have been out spending an evening and come home late. Not long since one of them said to her, "I don't believe anybody else will ever do that for me, and I doubt very much if I ever have another home that will be as pleasant as this has been."

Oh, it pays to treat the boys well!

Non-Breakable Lamp Chimneys.

Some person has studied out this way to prepare lamp chimneys so that they will not break: With a diamond cut the bulging part of the chimney with perpendicular lines at short distances apart. These cuts are said to give the glass the necessary room for expansion and contraction when quickly heated or cooled. If a diamond is not available, put the chimney in a pail, for protection, and immerse it in the reservoir of water on your cook-stove when the water is cool in the morning and let it remain all day while the water is hot and all night when it will slowly cool. This is a kind of annealing process that is said to toughen the glass. The use of soapsuds is to be avoided in cleaning, and only clear hot water used.

Cooking Recipes.

SOUP BALLS.—Boil five eggs until hard; remove the shells and pound the yolks until powdered. Add the whites of two uncooked eggs, with a little flour and salt. Mix into balls, boil and drop into the soup.

STEWED POTATOES.—Peel and cut into small pieces. To one pint of potatoes add one-half pint of milk, butter size of an egg, salt and pepper. Stew twenty minutes. Thicken with a tablespoonful of flour stewed in a cup of milk.

BEEF PIE.—Line a dish with a rich crust. Put in a layer of cold beef cut up fine, then one of onions; one of potatoes, then another layer of meat. Season with pepper and salt. Dredge with a little flour. Put on water enough to make a gravy, then a top crust. Bake one hour.

COOKIES.—One cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, two eggs, one-half cup of sweet milk, one teaspoon of baking powder, three cups of flour; roll thin, cut in shape and bake in a quick oven.

SEED COOKIES.—One cup of butter, three cups of sugar, two eggs, one cup of cream, eight cups of flour, two and one-half teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one teaspoon boils. Add the beaten yolk of one egg just as you take from the fire. Serve immediately.

CHICKEN RISSOLES.—Take cold baked chicken left from dinner; free the meat from the bones and chop fine. Rub a little dried bread into fine crumbs, and to this add any heated liquor of chicken, or hot water, and moisten the bread thoroughly. To a pint bowl full of crumbs and meat allow one teaspoonful of salt, one of pepper, one of sifted sage and one heaping teaspoonful of butter. Make into little cakes, dust with flour and fry to a light brown.

COOKIES.—One cup butter, two cups sugar, four eggs, four cups flour, three tablespoonfuls milk, three teaspoonfuls baking powder. Rub the flour and butter thoroughly together, cream the butter and sugar, beat the egg separately, add to the whole nutmeg, cinnamon or any flavoring preferred. Sift in the flour and baking powder and make it stiff enough to roll out and cut in any shape desired.

PORK CAKE.—One pound of fat salt pork chopped fine, one and one-half cups of boiling water poured over the pork, two pounds of raisins, currants and citron, two cups of sugar, eight cups of flour, one tablespoonful soda, and cloves and cinnamon to taste.

Hungry for Love.

Delays are always dangerous, but never so irredeemably as in the case of loving words or deeds. It always proves impossible to speak to-morrow exactly the cordial or affectionate word which to-day demanded of us.

A mother whose child had died suddenly was so entirely prostrated with grief that some of the too officious friends asked her to consider if her sufferings were greater than that of others who had lost friends.

"Oh, it is not the same, it is not the same!" she cried. "My little girl was different from other children; she was so loving! She used to come to me and beg me to kiss her, or take her in my lap for a minute, and sometimes I was busy and told her to run away and play.

"I hurt her little heart. I made it shut up its little leaves when it ought to have been coaxed open by the sunshine. I shall never forgive myself."

She never did forgive herself, and though she was almost pathetically loving to the children who were left, no lapse of time could ever erase from her mind the memory of that little girl who was hungry for love.

A Warning to Brutal Parents.

An immense impetus will be given to the Rev. B. Waugh's and other efforts for the protection of children from cruel parents by the sentence passed at Liverpool recently. The ill-treatment of a little girl by her father and stepmother was exceptionally bad. The father was a compositor, and his wife said that he was not responsible. The child was confined in a cellar, the air being excluded. It had little or no food, it was brutally flogged and kicked, and a red hot poker applied to it. The judge sentenced the man to seven years penal servitude and the woman to the same punishment for life. It is an awful sentence. Our only fear is that its very severity may evoke undue sympathy for cruel parents. On the other hand, we may undoubtedly hope that it will deter many a brute from putting his little ones to a slow death.

Nicely Put.

"Now, Mr. Bjones," said Mrs. Ringfinger, who was visiting Mrs. Bjones, "don't try to be polite. Do just as you would if we were not here, and we shall feel ever so much more at home."

$4,000,000.

Another celebrated miser was Ephraim Lapes Pereira, Baron d' Aguilar, formerly cashier of the Empress Maria Theresa, of Austria. Strange to say, the early years of his life at the Austrian court were years of splendor. Then he moved to England, married a wealthy lady and settled down. He lived in sumptuous style; kept several carriages and twenty servants. He was married twice, and after his second marriage he left his family and friends and withdrew himself from the fashionable world. He turned farmer. At this time he was worth $1,000,000. After a year in the country his place began to be known as "Starvation Farmyard." His cattle and poultry were a mass of skin and bones, and peasants began to hoot at the baron whenever he appeared for his mean treatment of his animals. He always insisted on being present when the stock was being fed, so that he might see that there was nothing stolen or wasted. He went about his farm clad in mean and dirty clothes, and refused to spend money to buy new ones. After a life of selfishness and meanness he died in March, 1802, leaving property estimated at $1,100,000. His diamonds alone were worth $150,000, while his solid silver plate weighed over 700 pounds.

But exceeding by far the example of John Elwes is that of Daniel Dancer, whose life is the most striking example perhaps in all history of the insatiable thirst for gold.

His father died and left him, together with a sister, a comfortable fortune. Dancer and his sister lived in a miserable hut near Harrow, in Middlesex, England. Their fae consisted of a piece of cheap beef and fourteen hard dumplings boiled on Sunday, and this lasted them the rest of the week.

The pair dressed in rags, and when the sister was dying from cold and starvation her brother refused to summon medical aid on the ground that he could not spend his money for medicine, because if the "old girl" was going to die the doctors couldn't save her anyhow. Dancer was too miserly to provide soap and towels for himself.

He would wash in a neighboring pool and lie out in the sun till he was dried. His clothes, a mass of patches, were held up by a belt of twisted hay, and his whole appearance was that of abject misery. Duncan on his rambles never returned empty handed. He would gather up the bones in the village streets and lanes, bring them home, and after picking them clean himself would crack them and feed them to the dog. Once neighbors complained that his dog worried and killed their sheep, and for fear that he would have to pay for future depredations, he took the dog to a blacksmith's where he had all the poor dog's teeth broken off to prevent a further recurrence of the trouble. He mended his own shoes and wore one hat continuously for thirteen years.

When he lay on his dying bed his only garment was an old sack. When remonstrated with he said that he came into the world without a shirt and he would go out of it that way. When a visitor suggested that he have a pillow for his head he ordered his only servant, whose weekly wages was thirty cents, to bring him a wisp of hay, which he used as a pillow till his death, a few days later. He left an estate valued at $25,000 amply sufficient for a his needs during his life-time, had he so desired. This money, in odd sums, was hidden in old rags, nailed down to the under part of the manger floor in his miserable cow shed, and over $10,000 was found hidden in the manure pile, where it had lain for years.

"Indeed yes. She is exquisitely painted."

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, JUNE 29, 1888.

—The plans and specifications of the proposed extension of the Napanee, Tamworth & Q. R. from Tamworth to Tweed have been filed at Ottawa. Upon the township of Hungerford voting a bonus of $15,000 the work will be pushed rapidly forward to completion. The matter is now being "worked up" in Hungerford and it is likely that a few days will determine the action of the township in the premises.

—It is announced that the Hon. Mr. Laurier will make a tour of Ontario this summer and address the people on the questions of the day. As leader of the Opposition in the House during the past session he has won much favor with the people and no doubt will receive a hearty reception whereever he speaks. We would suggest that the Reformers of Lennox secure him for one day. The French leader on the government side, Sir Hector Langevin, has been heard; now let us hear his opponent.

—For some reason or other a rumor has been set afloat in Ernesttown to the effect that the credit for baulking the Colebrook bridge scheme was due to the new members at the council board this year. This, anyone reading the report in THE EXPRESS of last week, can see is not the case. Reeve Parks, of North Fredericksburgh, is entitled to the credit. He first ferretted the matter up. This Messrs Reid and Baker, of Camden, corroborated at the late session. Having found that the bridge was not county property, Mr. Parks showed it to other members, Messrs Bowen Aylsworth and E.S. Lapum in particular. The fight really commenced at the December session before the new members were honored with seats at the council board.

—Considerable amendments have been made in the summary convictions act, which come into force at once. Perhaps the most important is that regarding witnesses refusing to answer summonses. By so doing they now make themselves liable to arrest without the warrant being "backed" and liable for all costs of summons, warrant and detention in custody. The Scott Act has also been amended. The clauses regarding druggists selling liquor and doctors' furnish certificates are made more stringent and the decision of police magistrates in the case of the latter can be appealed against

FROM THE CAPITAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

OTTAWA, June 26th.—The Postmaster-General has been asked to reduce the rate of postage from three to two cents, but has declined: First because the change would seriously impair the postal revenue, and secondly while there is a two cent rate in the United States we have a lower rate for drop letters and a parcel post which is unknown in the U.S. Canada uses almost 58,000,000 of three cent stamps. If therefore, the two cent rate was adopted the revenue would have suffered $575,000, provided the lower rate did not multiply the number of letters, which, however, was the experience of the States. Canada should at least raise the limit of weight to an ounce as there is more annoyance over the uncertainity whether your letter is overweight than there is over the cost of the stamp. The American limit is an ounce. The P.O. revenue is about $2,500,000 a year.

LORD STANLEY'S CARRIAGE.

The Governor General has brought a carriage with him which is a great curiosity to the natives. The bottom of the carriage rests on leather straps which are suspended from four high springs attached to the axles. The seat for the coachman in front is up about five feet, but the seat for the footman away up behind is even higher in the air. The trappings of the carriage are gorgeous. The massive wheels have silver plated caps for the hubs and the boxes are emblazoned with the coat of arms of the ancient house of Stanley's.

THE OLDEST SERVANT.

The oldest civil servant in the Dominion is Mr W.H. Griffin, the deputy Postmaster General, who has served Canada for 57 years, and is 76 years of age. He began in 1831 as a clerk and was steadily promoted. His successor will probably be Lieut-Col. White, the present Secretary of the Post Office Department, who is thoroughly up to the work. Mr W. D. Le Saueur, the the young literateur who is now Supt of the Savings Bank Branch, will likely take Col White's position.

A DISTINGUISHED VISITOR.

Prince Roland Napoleon Bonaparte, whose grandfather was a brother of the great Napoleon, was here a few days ago and was entertained by Hon Messrs Chapleau and Caron.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

The Government statistics of the railways of Canada have been prepared up to 31 Dec., 1887. Thirteen new lines are in existence and several of the older lines have added to the mileage under traffic. Iron rails are fast being replaced by steel. The increase in traffic over 1886 is represented by $5,000,000. Of track laid there are 12,332 miles, of which 11,691 are in operation. The earnings were $38,842,010, working expenses, $27,624,683 so that the net earnings were over eleven millions. Out of 10,698,638 passengers carried only 10 were killed and 49 injured. Up to date the Federal Government have aided railways to the extent of $129,000,000. The Ontario government have given $6,000,000 and Quebec over $7,000,000, New Brunswick $4,000,000, Nova Scotia $1,653,000, Manitoba $1,895,000. The municipalities gave over $12,000,000. Counting other sources the capital given by the people of Canada to railways amounts to the enormous sum of $63,000,000 or $55,117 for every mile. This record will compare with any other in existence.

An Extraordinary Offer to Wanting Employment.

We want live, energetic, agents in every county in the United States and Canada to sell a patent article of great merit, ON ITS MERITS. An article having a large sale paying over 100 per cent. profit, having no competition, and on which the agent is protected in the exclusive sale by a deed given for each and every county he may secure for us. With all these advantages to our agents, and the fact that it is an article that can be sold to every housekeeper, it might not be necessary to make "AN EXTRAORDINARY OFFER" to secure good agents at once, but we have concluded to make it to show, not only our confidence in the merits of our invention, but in its salability by any agent that will handle it with energy. Our agents now at work are making from $150 to $300 a month clear, and this fact makes it safe for us to make our offer to all who are out of employment. Any agent that will give our business a thirty days' trial and fail to clear at least $100 in this time, ABOVE ALL EXPENSES, can return all goods unsold to us and we will refund the money paid for them. No such employer of agents ever dared to make such offers, nor would we if we did not know that we have agents now making more than double this amount. Our large descriptive circulars explain our offer fully, and these we wish to send to everyone out of employment who will send us three one cent stamps for postage. Send at once and secure the agency in time for the boom, and go to work on the terms named in our extraordinary offer.

TESTIMONIALS.

The best work of the kind I have ever seen.—ROBT. GREENSHIELDS, accountant, Ottawa.

It can scarcely fail to obtain a wide circulation wherever introduced.—A. SMIRLE, school inspector, Ottawa,

"No work has appeared in Canada to compare with it. I do not know of any book where so much that is really useful has been so judiciously selected and so clearly and so concisely expressed."—R. R. COCHRANE, B. A.

Quite Correct.

I have used Dr Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry and found it the best remedy I have ever used for Dyspepsia and all summer complaints among children, and I think no household should be without it." Mrs A. Baker Ingoldsby, Ont.

After Long Years.

"I was troubled with Liver Complaint for a number of years; finding no cure I tried B.B.B. I took four bottles and am now perfectly cured, strong and hearty." Mrs Maria Askett, Alma, Ont.

A Severe Trial.

Frances S. Smith, of Emsdale, Muskoka, Ont, writes:—"I was troubled with vomiting for two years and I have vomited as often as five times a day." One bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters cured me.

The Chs

certificates are made more stringent and the decision of police magistrates in the case of the latter can be appealed against. The magistrates hitherto have had no power to issue search warrants for liquor until it was actually brought out in evidence that liquor was secreted in the premises and then if 500 gallons were found only 20 could be destroyed or confiscated. Now any one suspecting that liquor is on certain premises can so state before a police magistrate, who will issue a warrant, and upon any liquor, no matter what quantity, being found, it, and the articles in which it is stored, can be confiscated, providing of course that it is clearly shown that the liquor was for illegal purposes.

PERSONALS.

—The Misses Tilley are at Davy's Island.

—Miss Lily White, of Kingston, was visiting her parents on Saturday and Sunday.

—Miss Sarah J. Duncan (Garth Grafton) has been visiting at the home of Mr S. C. Warner, Bridge st.

—Mr J B Gordon, of Kingsford, made a call upon us Monday and of course subscribed for Napinee's popular local paper.

—Mrs C H McMullen went to Mrs Christie's summer resort—Davy's Island—on Wednesday where she will remain a season.

—Mr Jno R Tilley, who has been ill at the home of Mrs Tilley, Robt st, is spending the week at the popular summer resort—Davy's Island.

—We were pleased to receive a call from Rev D S Houck on Monday last. He is on the Newburgh circuit for another term and no doubt will prove as popular as ever.

—We regret to learn that Mrs Capt Collier has been lying dangerously ill for some time. At latest accounts she was improving and hopes are now entertained that she may recover.

—Messrs P Slaven, J P Hanley and D J Hogan went to Kingston on Wednesday as delegates from this section to the reception tendered Bishop Cleary on his return from Rome. Father McDonough was also in attendance.

—The following parties spent Sunday at Davy's Island: T E Anderson; P Barton and wife; W Light and A H Allison, of Napanee, Miss Pike, of Deseronto. Mr H M Deroche and family were also at the Island Sunday and remained over Monday.

—Our townsmen, the Messrs. Jones, deserve the highest commendation for their work at Trinity University. Mr H H was in the second year examinations and came out away ahead of all competitors. He passed with honors in classics and mental and moral philosophy, standing first in each case. His name appears first in the list of passmen in divinity, Latin and mental and moral philosophy. Mr Jones obtained the Wellington scholarship for mental and moral philosophy. His brother, Mr A C M, passed the first examination for B A, securing the governor-general's medal and 1st class honors in physical and natural sciences.

—Work they say has its reward. Such has proven the case with Capt A. F. Holmes, of this place. Our doughty friend has done more for the tories of Lennox than any other; his work has not been confined to this section either for he has assisted outside. That he would some day be rewarded was expected; therefore Wednesday morning when word reached Napanee that he had received a government appointment the townspeople were not greatly surprised. That he should receive one so agreeable to himself and for which he is so well qualified was cause for rejoicing. The captain has been appointed inspector of fisheries for northern waters. He will have command of the steam yacht Cruiser, which the government lately purchased from Allan Gilmour. The boat is a fine one, fitted up, it is said, at a cost of $20,000. It will ply chiefly on the Georgian bay. Friend Holmes is a Tory out and out; still there is no reason why we should not congratulate him, which we most cheerfully do. He possesses just the qualities to fill such a position.

MANITOBA'S SON.

On the 1st July, the twenty-first anniversary of Confederation, Senator Schultz will take office as Lieut-Governor of Manitoba in whose affairs he has had his lifetime been deeply interested. He was born in 1840, at Amherstburg, in the county of Essex, and graduated in medicine at the Kingston college in 1871. He has been in Parliament since 1871, when Manitoba was made a Province, and is married to a lady who was his devoted nurse all through his recent illness, an illness so severe as to leave him only the wreck of what he once was physically. Dr Schultz was once a very handsome man and is still of impressive presence. He endured many dangers and hardships during the first Northwest rebellion, when he was leader of the Canadian forces. During the last two sessions he has been the means of bringing to the knowledge of Parliament the resources of the McKenzie district.

THE CABINET.

The report that Mr Weldon, M. P. for Albert, N.B, is to be taken into the cabinet in place of Mr Costigan, is credited here as a very likely event. The change would give the Premier an able colleague in place of an incapable one. Mr Weldon is inexperienced but he is a promising member of the House. The purchase of a house by Mr Dewdney in Ottawa, confirms the report that he will become Minister of the interior Mr McLelan will leave the Postmaster-Generalship for the gubernatorial residence of Nova Scotia early in July. Hon C. H. Tupper will reach here this week to assume his new office as Minister of Marine. The Premier arrived in Toronto this morning where he went to reconcile his followers to Mr Dewdney's appointment. According to Judge McGuire, of the Northwest, Mr Dewdney is an eminently proper representative. He will, it is believed, seek a constituency in British Columbia.

ANOTHER LIEUT-GOVERNOR.

Hon Joseph Royal, a French Canadian lawyer, will be sworn in as Lieut-Governor of the Northwest Territories, on Dominion Day. He was associated with Hon J. A. Chapleau, in the defence of Lepine and Naud charged with the death of Thomas Scott. He wrote for the press until 1871 when he went to Manitoba and was styled the leader of the French of that Province. He was a member of the first Ministry in Manitoba. He was returned for Provencher in 1879 to the House of Commons and now vacates the seat by accepting an office under the Crown. He is Vice Chancellor of the University of Manitoba, and made his way mainly by the influence of Archbishop Tache, whose protege he was. He is 51 years old.

CAPITAL CHAT.

There are now five seats vacant in the Commons:—Cardwell, Nicolet, Provencher, Cumberland and Colchester. They all returned Conservatives at the general election.

Mr Hayter Reed has been appointed Indian Commissioner in place of Mr Dewdney.

General Middleton will inspect the Royal Military college at Kingston before it closes on the 29th. Sir John Macdonald has promised to present the prizes if possible.

PRESENTATIONS

To Rev. W. H. Emsley Before Leaving Napanee.

Monday evening, June 18th, Rev. Mr. Emsley met his class in the Eastern Methodist church, the service throughout being more interesting and impressive than usual through his connection with them being about at an end. At perhaps a later hour than at other times the service closed, Mr. Emsley retiring to the parsonage, little suspecting that later on he was to again meet the friends. Just as Mr. Emsley's family were thinking of retiring for the night the door-bell rang, and at once the class entered. Order being restored, the following address was read, and a handsome easy chair presented to the retiring clergyman:

TO REV. W. H. EMSLEY,

Dear Pastor and Leader,—The members of your Monday night class assure you that they realize with difficulty that your relation to them, which has existed so harmoniously, has been severed by the operation of church laws and the action of church authorities. But though you have been removed to another field of labor, within the bounds of another conference, imaginary lines cannot interfere with the liberty of esteem, the freedom of love or the influence of remembered joys. Whilst we have with others enjoyed the benefits of the word preached, it has been our special privilege to be associated with you in class relationship, for which we devoutly thank God. Under the influence of your anxiety in our behalf we have been aided to a fuller realization of God, as our loving Father, and of His Son Jesus Christ, as our loving personal Saviour, to whom we may at all times come with the utmost trust and confidence. We gratefully acknowledge that we have been so strengthened by your constant presentation of the love and goodness of God as to become partakers of your conviction that he not only provides for each the best of the life which now is, but that He will also in the life which is to come furnish the means whereby we may rise to the full perfection of our divinely bestowed powers.

As a pledge that we will walk in the way of the Lord until called to sit down with the King in His glory, as well as a visible token of our gratitude, we present for your kind acceptance this easy chair, indulging the hope that, as in physical weariness you betake yourself to its comfort and find rest, your spirit may in the hour of exhaustion or perplexity rest on the sure word of prophesy and find consolation and refreshment there. We hope and pray that the God of all grace may continue to use your eminent abilities for the advancement of His Kingdom and that he will abundantly bless you and Mrs. Emsley in your new field of labor, and long preserve your lives and conserve your happiness.

Signed on behalf of the Monday night class Napanee (East) Methodist church.

J. R. DAFOE,
F. W. VANDUSEN.

Napanee, June 18, 1883.

Never was man more surprised than Mr. Emsley. With tears in his eyes he replied as only he can. At first it was with difficulty that the rev. gentleman could speak at all, so visibly affected were the donors as well as the honored. In a little he, however, collected himself and replied very affectionately, thanking the friends for the present, and expressing sorrow at the parting about to take place. Not only as pastor had his sojourn in Napanee been pleasant but as a class-leader he had received an inspiration from them to better fight the battles of life and live for the Master. In his counsels he had always sought to give them words that would make them better men and women and had backed his teaching with prayers. He closed by again thanking them and trusting that the class would look steadfastly at Him in whom was all fullness.

The chair is an exceedingly fine one—walnut, finished in silk plush. The main covering is of mauve color, while across the front of the chair is a band of beautiful blue plush; the head rest is also blue.

Thursday morning, a little before Mr Emsley left for Brockville, he was again most agreeably surprised, by being furnishing them with copies of THE EXPRESS. They were welcome "visitors" at the camp; like letters from home.

The boys received letters from home saying that the Napanee people heard that some of No 6 company had received sunstrokes. There is no truth in the report. There has been no sickness in our company whatever and only four men in the whole 47th battalion.

On Monday the 47th went to the butts and did some good shooting. Following is the score made by No 6 company:

ROYAL

Toronto and Oswego, N.Y.

Benjamin, West & Co. are introducing new machinery into their wheel factory here.

Work has commenced on the new roller mill here, and will be prosecuted with vigor.

Rev Smith, Presbyterian minister, of Centreville, ably filled the pulpit in C. M. church here on Sunday night.

The base ball match on Saturday, between Enterprise and Yarker, resulted in victory for the Yarker boys—14 to 10

The crops in this vicinity are looking fairly well. A big change will be noted in a few days owing to the fine rain on Saturday night.

Gull Creek.

Mr John A. Lott is laid up at present, supposed to be by a slight sun-stroke while working out in the field.

Things were appearing to suffer for the want of rain, but the rain came on Sunday afternoon and revived the sufferers much.

The water is drying up very fast. Cross Lake reservoir has been exhausted it is said, but the dam is still kept up on the Clare River.

Mr Loyst's mare came in contact with an old wire fence recently and greatly injured herself. Wire fences are dangerous where animals are running at large.

The berry season has commenced Strawberries are the go at present, many creeping over the ground after the little dainties. Some say that they are not very plentiful; and their season will soon be over.

Huckleberries will be here soon. Many were predicting last week that these would be a failure on account of the intense heat. Probably the recent rain may have helped them.

Centreville.

Miss Shorey, of Maitland, spent a few days at Mr. M. C. Shorey's.

Mr. Peter Hinch has, so we are informed, bought out the business of Mr. Loucks.

Mr. James Tuttle, of Bridgewater, has been visiting friends in this vicinity lately.

Miss Dunbar, teacher of Reid's school, was the guest of Wesley Wagar Saturday and Sunday.

Some Centreville people attended the lawn social at J. D. Wagar's, Enterprise, on Wednesday, 27th.

M. C. Shorey was through part of Prince Edward county last week visiting friends. He reports it very dry in that section.

Mr and Miss Carlaw and Mr. Kent attended the "send off" given the Rev. Jas. Curts at Newburgh, on Wednesday evening of last week.

A meeting of the directors of Camden Agricultural Society met at Kennedy's hotel, on Saturday, 23rd. It was decided to hold the annual show on Saturday, October 13th.

The ladies of Centreville propose holding an entertainment on the evening of Saturday, October 13th. Proceeds for church purposes in connection with the Methodist church.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis Catarrh, asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 149 Block Rochester N.Y. 148y

Thursday morning, a little before Mr Emsley left for Brockville, he was again most agreeably surprised, by being presented with a complete set of Encyclopedia Brittanica, bound in sheep. The presentation was made by a number of the reverend gentleman's friends in and outside the church. The usual address was in this instance omitted, the presentation made in a quiet manner.

FROM THE CAMP.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Gananoque girls have caught the "scarlet" fever.

Excursions arrive here every day, and the parade grounds are crowded with strangers.

The boys have taken a number of trips down among the Islands. Boats are running all the time.

We have had a great deal of rain, supposed to be caused by the firing of the cannon and rifles.

Major General Middleton and the Minister of Militia after reviewing the troops left Wednesday morning.

The Kingston News says: "Lieut Smith is to be complimented on having the neatest company in camp."

Mr Geo Napier took a canoe down with him, and enjoyed many a pleasant hour on the St. Lawrence.

The soldiers appreciate the efforts of the Y. M. C. A. All sorts of amusements are furnished by them free of charge.

Baseball is the general sport of the evening and it is not an unusual sight to see twenty different nines playing at once.

The 47th batt band played for a garden party on Wednesday night. They are without doubt the best on the ground.

The battalion was inspected by Col Van Straubenzie on Wednesday. He was well pleased with the appearance of the men

At the Battalion drill on Monday afternoon the colonel complimented No 6 company upon their fine appearance and drill.

Messrs W. S Henry and H. Jamieson visited the camp on Monday and enjoyed the hospitality of "the boys" in the evening.

The Napanee band played for the excursion to General Middleton and Sir Adolphe Caron, Minister of Militia, on Monday evening.

A few days ago a soldier from Amherst Island was injured by falling on a tent pin. He was sent to the Kingston General Hospital.

Among the list of infantry officers who did not report was Capt Lennox, of the 49th Batt, who I understand is a resident of your town.

It is the intention of the boys to maintain No 6 company and to always deserve the praise which they have received at the Gananoque camp.

No 6 have formed a mess of their own and live about as well as the officers of the 47 h batt. The Gananoque girls have been very kind to the boys.

Lieut Sharp drilled No. 6 until Capt Helliwell came. The boys think Lieut. Sharp a perfect officer and a courteous gentleman. The boys owe much to him.

A free excursion for the boys is announced for Thursday evening I is tendered by the staff of the 47th. It will be to Brockville and return up the American channel per str Geneva.

The Napaneeans were pleased to see the following from home, who came down with the excursion on Monday last: Mrs F. W. Smith, Mr and Mrs Jno Stevenson, H Jamieson, W. S. Henry, Jas Miller, and Jas Wilson.

The members of No 6 company and the band boys appreciate your kindness in

YOUNG FOLKS.

THE PRICE OF A DINNER.

BY JOHN R. CORYELL.

One hot, dusty day in early May—it seemed like a midsummer day out of place—a lad with a weary, painfully lagging step toiled up the road that led to the hill-top overlooking the little town of Maple Centre.

Almost hidden under the lofty sugar-maples, with here and there a peaked roof or a gable window peeping out of the cool green, the town looked a paradise to the worn-out boy, who stopped in the hot sunshine, and emitted under his breath a soft "Ah!" of thankfulness.

For a moment a happy smile brightened his dark face, and one seeing him then would have thought him handsome; but the next moment he could as well have been thought ugly, for a sullen scowl chased away the boyish smile, and left a prematurely old and almost vicious expression.

"Won't let me stay there neither, I s'pose!" he muttered. "Well, they can't stop me from going through the town, an' they can't lock me up if I don't beg."

Near the foot of the hill he passed the school-house, and as he heard the hum of voices floating out of the open window, he wondered bitterly what it would be like to lead the comfortable, easy lives of the boys in there.

He was thirsty. A pump stood in the school-yard. He cast a quick glance around, and seeing nobody, stole in at the gate and towards the pump, with a manner at once stealthy and defiant, as if willing to escape detection, but ready to brave the consequences of it.

No one saw him, and he greedily drank down two brimming dipperfuls of the cool water. Then he stole out of the yard again, and limped on toward the centre of the town, until, unable to resist the tempting shade of one of the great maples, he dropped on the grass, and with a sigh stretched his numbed limbs.

The school doors had opened, and it was the buzz of eager young voices that had caused him to sink back, courting such obscurity as the grass and shade afforded. Laughing, shouting, running, throwing stones in the usual boy fashion, the boys came boisterously down the road. Furtively the little wayfarer watched their approach, hoping they would either not see or notice him, but preparing with dogged fierceness for the disappointment of his hopes.

There was a sudden hush as they drew nearer to him, and he knew he had been seen.

"It's a tramp," he heard one of them say; and though he did not stir, the angry blood rushed to his face, and turned the clear olive of his skin to a copper bronze.

When they drew nearer, and could distinguish more clearly, he heard the words, "It's only a boy."

Something in the tone of the voice impelled him to glance quickly around, and he did so just in time to see a stone leave the hand of one of the largest boys and come directly towards him.

To dodge the stone and spring to his feet seemed but one act, and in a second he stood, with scowling alertness, scanning the boys now crowding curiously together, and casting upon the one who had thrown the stone an angry look that in some subtle way seemed to contain an invitation to repeat his act of aggression if he dared.

The latter seemed to feel it so, for he laughed awkwardly, and said, "You'd better get out of here; we keep a jail in this town for tramps."

Some of the boys laughed, but most of

Harry, though his head was already aching and his eyes swelling from the telling blows he had received, had the courage to rush once more at his antagonist. Down he went again before the well-directed blows of the stranger; but this time, before he could recover again, his schoolfellows with one accord made a rush at the fighter and hustled him this way and that, with very little regard for the rules of fair play.

The stranger lad fought the crowd fiercely, making no outcry and saying no word until, having been pushed headlong into the dust of the road, he rose, faced the crowd, and sobbing and hoarse with passion, cried out, "I can whip any two of ye in a fair fight."

There seemed no disposition among the boys to put him to the test, but one small voice from the rear called out, "We'll have you arrested."

"You're afraid of me," he said, paying no heed to the threat. "Of me!" and there was a sort of pathetic self-pity in his taunt. "An' I've walked twenty miles since daylight, an' 'ain't had nothin' t' eat since yesterday morning."

He stood there defiantly for a few seconds as if waiting for another onslaught, and then, as the boys, now ashamed of themselves, did not move, he turned wearily away, more faint than before the excitement of the quarrel had lent him a false strength.

He paid no more attention to them, but accepting their treatment of him as a perfectly natural episode in his miserable young life, he limped sullenly through the town, asking no help and expecting none. On the outskirts of the little town he stopped from sheer exhaustion, and leaning against a fence, watched listlessly the movements of a young horse grazing in the field.

As he stood there a young girl hurried past him. He looked up and caught a backward, scared glance from her. She ran on, and he followed slowly, resenting in an undefined way her fear of him.

"What had she to be afraid of?" he asked himself. Not of him, surely, for he was too weary now to hurt anybody—too weary, indeed, to drag his feet any further.

He dropped weakly under a tree, and crossing his arms on his bent knees, laid his head forward on them, wondering if hi strength was going to give out before he could reach a place where he could get something to eat.

"If you will come home with me, I am sure I can get you something to eat,"

He looked up with a start. The little girl whose fear of him he had resented stood near him, looking down at him in a pitying yet partly fearful way.

His scowling scrutiny of her alarmed her, and she retreated a pace or two as she timidly went on:

"I heard you say you were hungry. I am sure mamma will give you something to eat."

"Yes," he said, with an ugly sneer, "so's she can have me arrested, for beggin'. No, you don't; you don't catch me so easy. Go on now, and leave me alone."

"Oh!" exclaimed the little girl, in a shocked tone, "how can you say such things? Mamma wouldn't do that for anything."

"No, of course not," he began, sarcastically. And then even his savage fortitude broke under his hunger and weariness, and with a quick, catching sob he wailed appealingly: "Why can't you leave me alone? What have I done to you?"

The brown head fell once more on the ragged arms, and with wide-open eyes the little girl saw the fierce fighter of a few minutes before crying bitterly.

Tears filled her own eyes, and after a moment of timid hesitation she stole up to the friendless lad and gently laid her little

"The one that pelted me? the one I whipped?"

"Yes," responded Katie, uneasily; and then to change the subject, said, "He—the horse I mean—killed our cow last week."

"Did, eh?"

"Yes, Daisy broke in somehow, and he just kicked her so that she died."

"Did he give you another cow?"

"No; he said Daisy had no business to break the fence."

"Has he ever tried to have the horse broken?"

"Yes indeed; but nobody can. He feels bad about it too, for he says its a splendid horse."

"Yes, it's a nice horse. Do you live in that house there?"

"Yes, the green house there. It's the last house this end of town."

"Katie Morris, you said, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"All right. Is that Squire Blodgett's house?"

"Yes."

"Good by, Katie."

"Good-by."

Dick turned back toward the town, and walked away, leaving Katie to wonder what he meant by his odd, quickly put questions, and by returning to town. In the midst of her wonderment she heard her mother calling her, and ran at once to tell what had happened.

Dick, glancing over his shoulder, saw her return home, whereupon he retraced his steps to the gate of Squire Blodgett's lane, and opening it, walked in with the utmost confidence.

Ten minutes later Squire Blodgett was saying to him, "Break my horse? What nonsense is this? What do you mean, you little jackanapes, by coming here with such a story? Who sent you?"

"I tell you I can break your horse to drive kind an' gentle. 'Tain't no nonsense, an' nobody sent me. 'Twon't hurt you to let me try, will it?"

"It won't hurt me, but it would you. Why, he would kick your brains out in two minutes. But see here," exclaimed the Squire, with sudden sharpness, "aren't you the little tramp that got into a fight with my boy?"

Dick's dark eyes flashed angrily, and a saucy retort rose to his lips, but he who had never controlled his temper for his own sake now subdued it for the sake of those who had been kind to him. With an effort he answered, calmly: "I'm no tramp. Your boy pelted me with stones, and I whipped him; that's all."

"That's all, is it?" cried the Squire, angrily. "You little scoundrel!" He caught Dick by the collar, and lifted his hand to cuff him.

"It was my fault, father." Dick turned quickly, and saw Harry, with both eyes black and blue, hurrying up to save him from the squire's wrath.

"I hit him first," continued Harry.

"Oh, you did, eh?" growled the Squire, loosing his hold of Dick, and looking foolish. "Well, get out of here, and be thankful I don't lock you up."

But Dick was not prepared to go yet. "About the horse, Squire?"

"Why, you little impostor, d'you think I'd take the risk of your neck?"

"It's no risk at all, Squire. I've broken hundreds, if I am only a boy. I was born in a stable, an' spent my life there, an' I know some things 'tain't many does know. Let me try."

"Well," said the Squire, impressed by Dick's earnestness, "I'll let you try; but mind, if you get killed, don't blame me."

"I won't. And about the pay for it?"

"Well, if you really do break the horse,

The latter seemed to feel it so, for he laughed awkwardly, and said, "You'd better get out of here; we keep a jail in this town for tramps."

Some of the boys laughed, but most of them moved uneasily to one side, and stood there as if too curious to be willing to lose the chance of seeing what might take place, and yet disinclined to endorse the action of their school-fellow.

With a sort of contemptuous fierceness the stranger glanced from the head to the feet of the boy, and back again to his head, and then said, tauntingly, "You kin throw stones at a feller behind his back an' you kin talk to his face, but you dassent lay a finger on me."

The girls had come up by this time, and were moving slowly by, waiting for something tohappen at which they should scream and run.

"Leave him alone, Harry!" "Come on, Harry!" "What's the matter?" exclaimed several of the older girls; but Harry found himself unable to gracefully extricate himself from the quarrel, and therefore answered the boy with a sullen nttempt at carelessness:

"I don't want to touch you. Why should I?"

"What did you want to throw the stone for, then?"

Harry might properly have answered that he had done it thoughtlessly, and was sorry for it; but it is not very often a boy's way to substitute moral courage for physical, and as Harry had plenty of the latter sort of courage, he met the taunting logic of the stranger's question by taking a menacing step forward and answering, angrily, "Because I wanted to. What of it?"

The prospect of a fight had a singular effect upon the strange lad. His eye lost its hunted, sullen look, and became brightly alert, his feet shifted position a little, and his hands clinched, though they hung carelessly by his side. His manner lost its excitement, and became quitely, almost pleasently expectant. He answered Harry with an exasperating sneer. "Talk's cheap. Why don't you do it again if you dare?"

Harry could feel that his school-mates were wondering if he were afraid of the boy so much smaller than himself, and in a gust of anger he stopped, picked up a small stone, and threw it at his antagonist.

According to the boys' unwritten code of honor a fight was now necessary, and the two lads understood it so, for in a twinkling they stood facing each other.

Harry stood as he had seen pugilists in pictures stand; the stranger lad seemed to the excited boys who watched him to be a mere novice in the art af fighting, since he held one arm loosely by his side, and had the other but slightly raised in front of him.

Harry hated to strike a boy so poorly prepared to guard himself, but he was angry enough to be willing to teach him a lesson, so he said, as he struck at him, "Take that."

Just where Harry's fist went out not even the lookers-on could see. Somehow the unguarded boy had evaded the blow, and had delivered in return a quick pat-pat that sent Harry reeling backward. And then, before he could recover himself, came another pat-pat that laid him flat upon his back.

The girls screamed, the boys crowded nearer, and the young pugilist stood alertly on guard, keeping his eye at once on Harry, struggling in a dazed way to his feet, and on the latter's friends, who were glancing at him with mingled curiosity and anger.

Nothing daunted, but seemingly stimulated by the prospect of more fighting to do, the stranger lad exclaimed, tauntingly: "Has he got enough yet, or does he want more?"

little girl saw the fierce fighter of a few minutes before crying bitterly.

Tears filled her own eyes, and after a moment of timid hesitation she stole up to the friendless lad and gently laid her little hand on his shoulder, and said, sympathetically: "Please don't cry. I'm so sorry for you!"

"G'way now, I tell you!" he snarled, jerking his shoulder from under the pitying hand. "Leave me alone."

She cast upon him a sorrowful look of wonder, and then turned and ran away.

The boy had rejected her offers of help and her sympathy with churlish distrust, but underneath the distrust an atom of hope had struggled for recognition, and therefore when the child accepted her repulse and ran away, a heavy despair smote the lads heart, and he threw himself at length on the grass, murmuring, as if it had but just come to him, "I'm so hungry!"

He had not lain there long when he heard approaching footsteps. He did not look up; he was reckless of the consequences of being seen there.

"Won't you please eat this? Indeed we wouldn't have you arrested for anything."

He looked up into the distressed face of the little girl, and then down at a heaped-up plate of food which she had placed beside him. Then without a word, but with frequent furtive glances at her as she leaned against the fence, he ate every morsel on the plate.

"What's your name?" he asked, abruptly, as she stooped to pick up the plate.

"Katie Morris."

There was an awkward pause, during which he seemed engaged in fixing her name in his memory. Presently to relieve her embarrassment, she asked, "What's yours?"

The lad's cheeks flushed and his brown eyes searched her blue ones as he answered slowly, "Dick."

"Dick what?"

Again he cast upon her a quick, searching glance, and then, hesitating a moment, said, "Won't you tell anybody if I tell you?"

"No—o," she answered, in uneasy surprise.

"Dick Rodriguez," he said, lowering his voice, and yet showing signs of some pride in the name.

She repeated the name, and he was evidently surprised that she showed no emotion at hearing it.

"Champion boy bare-back, you know," he said, in an explanatory tone.

"Oh," she ventured, doubtfully, "in a circus?"

He nodded his head proudly, and then with a sudden relapse into his ugly scowl, said: "He was allus a-lickin' me, an' I ran away. He ain't my father anyhow, an' he 'ain't no right to lick me. Don't you give me away if anybody comes around askin' for me, will you?"

"I won't," said Katie, at the same time frightened and pleased at being taken into the confidence of the runaway circus boy.

"Yes," said Dick, finding it pleasant to talk of his troubles and himself. "I've walked over a hundred miles. I'm going to Toronto. They don't let a feller beg, do they? I'm willing to work, but they all call me a tramp and drive me away."

Katie looked shocked; and then, seeing Dick was silent, asked him, by way of drawing him out, if he could ride that horse, pointing to the one grazing near by.

"Of course," he said, carelessly.

"But he's awful. Nobody can drive him or do anything with him. They can't even get near him."

"So," said Dick, eyeing the horse with critical interest. "Is he yours?"

"No—o; he belongs to Squire Blodgett, the boy's father."

"Well," said the Squire, impressed by Dick's earnestness, "I'll let you try; but mind, if you get killed, don't blame me."

"I won't. And about the pay for it?"

"Well, if you really do break the horse, I'll see you don't complain."

"No, sir, I want to make a fair, square bargain beforehand. I can break the horse, an' I want fair pay."

"You do. What is your price, then, my young Rarey?"

"A cow?"

"What?"

"A cow. I'll agree to break your horse to drive safe an' gentle, and I want you to give an order for the choice of your cows when it's done."

"You're very modest."

"It's worth it, an' you know it. What d'ye say?"

"Have it your own way. If you break the horse—and I begin to have some confidence in you—you'll have earned the cow. Can you catch the horse? Nobody here can."

"I can catch him. Can you give me a long piece of strong clothes line?"

It is unnecessary to tell by what means Dick subdued the Squire's horse, for subdue it he did, much to the Squire's amazement and delight. He employed a few simple devices well known to horse tamers, and did not occupy over an hour in making the vicious colt as gentle as an old horse.

The Squire endeavored to discover who the young horse-tamer was, but without success, for Dick refused to answer any questions; but having obtained the order giving the choice of the Squire's cows, he drew Harry to one side, and said: "That was mighty square of you to own up to the old man. Will you shake hands?"

Harry took his hand, and shook it heartily. Dick flushed, and after hesitating a minute, said, awkwardly, "You can write, I s'pose? I can't."

"Yes," answered Harry, "I can write. Do you want me to write something for you?"

"Yes; I want you to please put down plain on a piece of paper, 'Dick Rodriguez is no tramp; he pays for what he eats.'"

Harry wonderingly wrote as dictated, and then looked at Dick.

"Anybody can read that, Mr.?"

"Oh yes."

"Then just put both papers in a envelope, and let Mrs. Morris have 'em—Katie Morris's mother, you know."

"I will."

HEALTH.

Moderation and Regularity.

The means to be adopted for the attainment of robust health are cleanliness, regularity of habits, moderation in diet, exercise, preferably in the open air, in accordance with the capacity of the individual and nature of the contest, and abstinence from strong drinks and tobacco.

If a man trains simply to improve his health he does so more or less moderately; if for a contest, more or less strictly in accordance with the importance of the event. A man can do either without a trainer if he has an ordinary amount of common sense and will power. The man who simply desires to live in a sound, healthy condition should follow these rules, modifying them slightly, according to the age or physique:

Get up not later than 7 A. M., sponge and rub yourself with a coarse towel until the skin is red. It is good exercise. Then dress and take a fairly long walk before and after breakfast. Walk to your place of business. Attend to work in the usual way, resisting every inclination you may have to give way to indolence. Walk home. Never mind the weather; a little rain will not hurt you and Summer heat will not affect you when you have done it long enough to do you good. Then have dinner, avoiding, as at your lunch and breakfast, fat, greasy, sweet, highly flavored or seasoned food. Water is the best thing to drink and that is better drank after finishing your meal. Take your time over dinner in particular and other meals in general. If you have not time to get a meal leisurely go without it, as it will not injure you quarter as much as it will to eat it in a hurry. Amuse yourself in the evening according to your taste, which as you get healthier will incline to active rather than effeminate amusements. Repeat the sponging and rubbing and go to bed before 11 P.M.

A gentleman of our acquaintance on the shady side of 40, who is following this programme, stands about six feet and weighs nearly 200 pounds. He took my advice and has long since done away with his collection of medicines and embrocations, while since commencing he has had no occasion for a doctor. Neither the heat last Summer nor the cold this Winter troubled him. During the day business tasks have ceased to be burdensome, and at night he sleeps the sleep of the just. The little trouble it takes has become a pleasure, and he is quite satisfied that the benefit he has derived is worth more to him than he could pay for it. He never has any inclination for and can easily resist the temptation to partake of luxuries or bilious dishes.

The professional should train more strictly. Nearly all the time he is not sleeping or eating he should spend out of doors or in practising that, or some part of that, feat which he is training for. Neither amateur nor professional should work too hard at first, but should at all times bear in mind that over-exertion is more harmful than insufficient exercise. I advocate the subjugation but not the extinction of any natural desire. A requirement of nature should always afford pleasure, but should never become a propensity. If a person desires to improve deportment, grace and freedom of motion, and to acquire vigor, he should box or fence, or both, taking lessons at first that he may commence with a good system.

Follicular tonsillitis is a more serious form of sore throat. It is perhaps due to an infectious element, but even this is generally powerless where the physical condition of the person who is exposed to it is otherwise good. In this case, too, the stomach may be the prime offender. More frequently the disease comes to those whose physical condition is depressed by bad hygienic surroundings.

There are feverish symptoms, the tonsils are inflamed and swollen, and covered more or less with small white circular spots. These may individually enlarge, so as to form patches somewhat resembling the characteristic patch of diphtheria, which, however, is a skin like membrane, while the patches in tonsillitis are merely an exudation on the surface, which can be wiped off. The case should, nevertheless, always have the care of a physician.

Sometimes the tonsils become greatly inflamed, with a tendency to abscess. It becomes difficult to swallow, and, indeed, to open the mouth. Behind the lower jaw a painful swelling is observed.

The difficulty may increase for several days, and then the inflammation may go down, or, what is quite as likely to happen, a very painful abscess may be formed, on the evacuation of which the symptoms subside. This is what is often called quinsy.

"Soda-Water."

The drinking of so called "soda-water" is becoming more and more general. Soda fountains are found not only in drug stores, but in restaurants, bar-rooms, confectionery stores, and retail merchant establishments.

All are familiar with the effervescence and foam that attend the mixing in water of carbonate of soda and tartaric acid. As the term "soda" is applied both to the fountain and to the drink issuing from it, one naturally supposes that there is soda in the foaming fluid he is taking.

It is not so, however. The water is charged with carbonic acid, and is flavored and sweetened with some of the various syrups. The carbonic acid gas forced into water with a pressure of one hundred and eighty pounds to the square inch, and it is the escape of this gas, when the faucet is turned and the water flows into the tumbler, that causes the foaming.

The gas was formerly obtained from carbonate of soda, and hence the present name, which still clings to it; but it is now obtained from marble, which is a carbonate of lime. Marble is simply lime and carbonic acid chemically combined. The union is a weak one. Sulphuric acid has a much stronger affinity for the lime than the carbonic acid has, and upon being poured on powdered marble releases the carbonic acid, which is then absorbed by the water. It makes no difference with the drink whether the carbonic acid is obtained from soda or from marble, since nothing but the acid passes into the water.

In, and in the neighborhood of, large cities, the sellers of soda-water do not charge their own fountains. It is done for them at large central establishments.

The question has been put to us if soda-water is wholesome. Almost any acidulated drink is pleasant in summer, and it often meets a real need to the system. Probably carbonated water is as wholesome as any.

We should advise less of the syrup than is commonly taken, partly because it is apt not to be pure, and partly because, even if pure, it is not very good for the stomach. "Plain soda" is better than soda with syrup, and, after a little time, quite a pleasant as that.

MANHOOD

How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

In writing lately on muscle-forming food, we referred to the interdependence between the different bodily organs and tissues, so that the body, to be properly built up, must be built up as a whole. Even muscular development may be carried to such an extent as to impoverish the brain and reduce the fat below what is required as surplus food against emergencies, as a protection against cold, and to supply those parts which consist largely of fat—the brain, nerves and marrow.

For, while surplus fat is an incumbrance, and sometimes a disease, a normal amount —and this not small—is as essential as muscular fibre.

An illustration of some of these principles is given by the experience of Sullivan, the pugilist, in his recent fight in France, and it is perhaps the only useful consequence of that brutal encounter.

Sullivan had spent six weeks in preparing for the contest, and is said in that time to have reduced his weight forty pounds—at the rate of nearly a pound a day! But while thus getting rid of fat, he was not at the same equally building up muscular fibre. This is a far slower process than "training down to weight."

Moreover, the loss of fat made him oversensitive to the chilling rain, in the midst of which the fight was carried on, while the muscles needed an extra support for their long-continued and exhausting work. At the same time the nerve power was greatly reduced, for the fat, of which the brain and nerves so largely consist, is as essential to their normal action as is any other constituent. And, indeed, this nerve-power is the working force of the system as truly as steam is of the engine.

Says Mr. John Boyle O'Reilly, the well-known poet and writer, and a good authority in physical culture: "Sullivan was over-trained. This is the rule rather than the exception with English trainers.

"They reduce a man's nervous or vital force to build up his muscular powers, and they take out all his fat, so that he gets chilled when he strips, and cannot heat again.

"It vas just the same when Heenan fought King in England. He was a marvel of beauty when he stripped, but before the fourth round his breath was roaring in him as he said himself. He had to come to a stop while his muscles were filled with power, because there was no nervous force to drive the muscles."

This is admirably put, but it is hardly proper for Mr. O'Rielly to say, "while the muscles were filled with power." There was only a capacity for the use of power—the nervous force—which the central nervous system was not then in a condition to furnish to the degree required.

Sore Throats.

Few ailments are more common than sore throats, yet they are largely preventable. That is, they seldom come to one in vigorous health, except as the result of some violation of physical law.

The more simple form of sore throat is commonly due to exposure to inclement weather, but often indirectly to a disturbed stomach. In fact, it is not unfrequently due to this cause alone. The person says he has taken cold, and wonders how he could have done so, while the truth is, he has not taken cold at all.

The stomach, œsophagus, mouth, nose, etc., are lined with a mucous membrane continuous through this whole region, and the irritation begun in the stomach is propagated over the whole mucous surface. In all such cases the seat of the trouble is the stomach, and accordingly the efforts at cure, whether by medicine, by diet, or by treatment, should be directed to that organ.

"Plain soda" is better than soda with syrup, and, after a little time, quite a pleasant as that.

We believe that care is taken to have the water pure, and to keep the apparatus free from corrosive matter, and when this done, no harm is likely to result from a moderate resort to the fountain.

Precautions Against Sunstroke.

The full meaning of sunstroke is not included in that term. Heatstroke or insolation is a better word, and implies a further peril besides the downright glare of an unclouded sun. The concentrated heat of a close workroom, as well as the exposure incurred by some careless laborers in the open field may lead to most serious consequences. The exhaustion of work also, particularly if clothing is heavy, is a predisposed condition which should not be lost sight of. Ventilation, regular nutrition, light clothing, and, as far as possible, remission of the pressure of work, are strongly indicated by the weather conditions under which we are now living, and we therefore venture to impress their importance alike on employer and employed. Beer and other stimulants are hurtful rather than helpful, and the substitution of non-intoxicant cooling drinks for those beverages is a truly scientifi and sanitary advance in public taste. Protection of the head is a subject which is now fairly well understood. It should not be forgotten that the neck as well as the cranium requiries to be covered.

A Torch for Insect Nests.

A late bulletin (No. 10) issued by the entomologist, Prof. C. V. Riley, of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, gives the following directions for making a torch to be used in burning the nest of such insects as the orchard caterpiller and fall web worm. Take a piece of soft brick known as salmon brick, and trim it to an egg shape; then take two flexible wires, cross them over the brick, wrap them around it, and twist the ends together. Then attach it by the wires to a long stick, and soak the brick in coal oil; light it with a match, and you are armed for the work. Asbestos may be used to advantage; and a little thorough work early enough in the season, will obviate the necessity of more expensive remedies at a later time. The soaking in the oil may be repeated as often as required to maintain the flame.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

Universal Grief at the German Emperor's Death—Gratitude to the English Doctor—The Mikado of Japan Discouraged by the Results of His Liberel Rule.

Among the members of the English royal family the feeling even stronger than that of grief at the Emperor Frederick's death is gratitude to Sir Morell Mackenzie, without whose skill the Queen's eldest daughter would never have been Empress, but lived a royal pauper, depending on her wealthy mother and the unreliable charity of the German Reichstag. Sir Morell Mackenzie intends taking a trip of three weeks on the Continent before returning to England. When he does come back there is no doubt that he will be made a baronet, and it is even believed that the custom which has hitherto prevented any medical man from being made a peer may be abolished in his favor. All sorts of extravagant guesses have been made as to the amount paid to Mackenzie by his royal patient. The amount which he has really received is payment at the rate of $100,000 a year ever since he took charge of the case. On his return there is no doubt that his practice and income as a physician will be greater than that of any doctor in England.

The sympathy felt for the late Emperor and the grief at his death among English people are very great. No foreign monarch's death has ever caused so much sincere sorrow. His fortitude and simplicity, which are qualities much admired in England, won for him the liking of the English people. Innumerable anecdotes and endless memoirs have been written of his life.

The Mikado of Japan is disappointed in his queer-eyed subjects. They failed to appreciate the liberal edicts by which he granted them freedom of press and permission to do as they liked. The press devotes itself principally to poking fun at the royal family, and the people have been industriously forming themselves into all kinds of secret societies, which his Majesty considers objectionable. Now the press has been remuzzled, the societies have been broken up, and the Mikado announces that he will resume his line of conduct as a well-meaning despot.

SAVING A CHILD FROM AN ALLIGATOR.

Thrilling Experience of Life in California.

A family named Lambert living on Lake Charlie Apopka, California, or Tsala Lake, as it is called, report a very thrilling experience. The family is composed of Mr. and Mrs. Lambert and three children, two boys and a girl baby, the boys being 8 and 15 respectively, and the girl just able to toddle about. They moved there some two years ago and preempted a homestead on the south side of the lake.

The house is built about 20 feet from the lake and on a slight elevation, the land in front sloping down gradually to the water's edge. At the left, off some little distance, is an immense saw grass pond. Near this Mr. Lambert built an enclosure for his pigs, one side facing the lake, and up to a month ago he had a magnificent lot of porkers. One night several weeks ago he heard for a moment, and she made another frantic effort to free herself, but it was in vain, and she felt herself drawn into the water. Suddenly her hands, which were nervously clutching at anything and everything that seemed to promise support, passed over the the axe handle. With the swiftness of thought and with superhuman energy she seized the helve and scrambled up, and how she cannot say. She managed to deal the 'gator a heavy blow with the blade. With rare good fortune it struck his other eye and crushed into the head. The maddened and wounded reptile opened its jaws with a roar of pain and rage, and Mrs. Lambert's dress slipped off its huge teeth. Scrambling up she seized her baby and fled wildly to the house and fell on the porch in in a dead faint.

A TREMENDOUS UPROAR

Suddenly, with a heavy sinking of the heart, she felt that her foot was in the water, and that, if no help came, she was doomed to a terrible death.

THE HORROR GAVE HER STRENGTH

Her husband, on returning home at night, found her there unconscious, with the child patting her mother's cheek and trying to arouse her. Doctors were at once summoned, but at last accounts the sorely tried mother was living over again her heroic fight in the fever of delirium. The next day Mr. Lambert went to the lake, and at the same spot soon found out the old 'gator lurking in the weeds. As footsteps were heard approaching, he came forth menacingly, but two shots from a 44-calibre Winchester soon placed him hors de combat. The wounds in his head were deep, and showed that the mother's arm had struck a terrible blow. The little child was not hurt, as the 'gator's teeth had caught in its dress.

ENGLISH AS VOLAPUK.

Anglo-Saxon Gradually Becoming the Language of all the World.

A universal language must be a growth. Some national language must expand until it covers the whole world. Of late years the English language alone has been much spoken of as likely to grow so great. Hardly any philosophic linguist attempts to forecast the future without some discussion of the destiny of English; and De Candolle calculates that within 100 years English will be spoken by 860,000,000 of men, German by 124,000,000 and French by 96,000,000. At present the populations either speaking the English language or under the domination of English-speaking peoples number more than 318,298,000, or one-fourth of the population of the globe.

English-speaking races occupy one-fourth of the dry land of the earth, and own nearly two-thirds of the tonnage of the ships. They live in all regions; they handle all articles of trade; they preach to all nations; they command one-half of the world's gold and silver, and distribute more than two-thirds of the Bibles and Testaments. More than one-half of the letters mailed and carried by the postal service of the world are written, mailed and read by the English-speaking populations, The expectation that English will come into universal use is not based upon anything in the nature of the language, but rather on the character and circumstances of the people.

The English people have been the great colonizers of modern times. They have taken possession of America, of Australia, of South Africa, the regions which are to be the seam of new empires, and they control and assimilate the populations which flow into them and which grow up in them.

The Water of Lake Superior.

How cold the dark water of Lake Superior.

A Mother's Dream Verified.

An inquest, which Mr William Carter styled one of the strangest that had ever come before his notice, was held at the Branksome Arms, Branksome Road, Brixton, England, recently. The deceased was Alice Elizabeth Baker, aged four years, the daughter of George Baker, a postman, living at 24 Branksome Road. The mother stated that at about half-past six o'clock in the morning she had a dream, in which she thought her child was dying, and heard a voice saying, "How happy it is to die in peace." She woke up suddenly, thinking she heard her child cry "Mother mother!" Hurrying to the bedside she found the child dying. Medical aid was at once summoned, but the child died a few minutes later from congestion of the lungs. The jury returned a verdict of "Death from natural causes."

Not So Soft as They Look.

"Country boys are not such squash-heads as they sometimes look," said the sociable drummer at the Broezel house. "One day last week I was out riding with a fellow who seemed to think it his mission to say or do something smart every minute. Presently we overtook a barefoot urchin driving a cow home from pasture, and my companion reined up the horse and spoke to him, saying, 'Say, my little man, what time will it be at six o'clock this afternoon?' Without a moment's hesitation the lad answered:—'Twill be bedtime for hens and fools. You're not a hen, but 'twill be your bedtime all the same.'"

"She's Much Older Than Her Husband."

We heard a young girl make the above remark the other day about a lady with whom we are slightly acquainted. It was not true, yet the lady in question actually does look five years older than her husband, although she is really several years his junior. She is prematurely aged, and functional derangement is the cause. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription would cure her, and should be recommended to her, and to all others who are in the same condition. If the reader of this chances to be a similar sufferer, let her get the "Prescription." It will back her lost beauty, and, better still, it will remove all those distressing symptoms which have made life a burden to her so long. Money refunded if it don't give satisfaction. See guarantee printed on bottle wrapper.

$500 Not Called For.

It seems strange that it is necessary to persuade men that you can cure their diseases by offering a premium to the man who fails to receive benefit. And yet Dr. Sage undoubtedly cured thousands of cases of obstinate catarrh with his "Catarrh Remedy," who would never have applied to him, if it had not been for his offer of the above sum for an incurable case. Who is the next bidder for cure or cash?

is an immense saw grass pond. Near this Mr. Lambert built an enclosure for his pigs, one side facing the lake, and up to a month ago he had a magnificent lot of porkers. One night several weeks ago he heard in his hog pen, and hurrying out with his shot gun and lantern, he was just in time to see one of his fine hogs disappearing in the lake in the mouth of a huge alligator, while the scores of balls of fire seen glittering in the darkness on the lake showed the presence of others.

From that beginning their inroads were kept up with great regularity, and though he killed a dozen or more, yet the pork was too nice for them to relinquish their feeding ground. Lately they have grown so bold as to crawl into his yard in daytime, and the predatory raids of the marauders on his hogs and fowls have rendered Mr. Lambert's life a burden.

A recent adventure, however, of two members of his family with one of these dreadful creatures has so terrified the farmer and has so alarmed his entire household that he is seriously contemplating abandoning his place. One Saturday afternoon a short time ago Mrs. Lambert, who was in the back part of the house, was

of her little girl and frantic cries of "Mamma! Mamma!" Hurrying to the front of the house, she could not at first locate the little one's whereabouts, but her piercing screams continued, and the almost frantic mother soon discovered the flutter of her child's dress near the lake shore, the palmetto bushes nearly hiding from her view. Snatching up an axe from the wood-pile, she flew to the water's edge, and as she rounded the palmetto patch a sight burst upon her that nearly drove her crazy. On the edge of the bank, with its body half in the water, was a huge alligator with its forepaws outstretched, raising it from the ground, while its tail lashed the water into foam. Just in front of it, and clinging to a palmetto root with her tiny hands for dear life, was the little girl, her dress being held in the jaws of the alligator, who was slowly dragging the child. The alligator's dull eyes gleamed with anger, like red coals of fire, and when Mrs. Lambert appeared the monster uttered a hoarse bellow and started backward, tearing loose the child's slight hold.

The latter's infantile features were drawn into an agonized appeal and as the animal dragged her down she was too completely paralyzed with fear to even cry out. The peril of her baby banished all fear from Mrs. Lambert, and she rushed up and over the head with the axe, and, seizing the child with both hands, tried to pull her away.

The sharp blade cut into the alligator's eye, and mad, with pain, he opened his jaw and half sprang at the woman. This left the child free, and they both fell backward Mrs. Lambert said afterward that at this moment she never expected to save her life.

As she fell the alligator swung around its tail with a terrible sounding whisk, but the fortunate fall of the two just placed them outside its deadly sweep. The alligator advanced as far as it could with unwieldy waddle, and Mrs. Lambert attempted to rise and escape. Her dress caught on a root, and before she could get up and free herself, the alligator made a snap at her and missed, catching hold of her dress instead. Finding that it had secured something it commenced backing toward the water, dragging along the prostrate woman, who now fully realized her peril, and filled the air with her cries for help. She frantically clutched at the roots as she was dragged over them, but her dress was of stout material, and the alligator's strength soon overcame her feeble resistance.

The Water of Lake Superior.

How cold the dark water of Lake Superior is! One evening when we were steaming across that lake I asked the mate what was done when a man fell overboard. He coolly replied, "Nothing." "Why?" I asked, astonished at his heartlessness. "The water of Lake Superior is so cold that a man cannot live in it during the time it takes to stop a rapidly moving vessel and lower a boat," he replied. Then he added: "I have sailed on this lake for twenty years. During that time I have known many men to fall off vessels. I know of one man only who escaped death. He was saved by a scratch. The others were apparently killed by the shock produced by falling into such cold water." He picked up an empty can to which a long string was attached and cast it overboard. The can skipped from the crest of one wave to that of another for an instant, then dipped and filled. The hoary-headed mate drew the full can up and handed it to me, saying, "Take a drink of that, and then say what you think of your chances of swimming in Lake Superior for ten or fifteen minutes." I drank deeply, and it was as though liquid ice flowed down my throat. "It is alleged," the mate said, "that this lake never gives up its dead, that to be drowned in Lake Superior is to be buried for all time. I do not know whether this is true or not, but I do know that I have never seen a corpse floating on the lake." I wonder if that is true? I doubted it, but I could find no sailor who had ever seen a dead body floating on the Lake.

Where Women Excel.

Women may not have a great head for many things, but they have for secreting valuables. There was a woman on Holly avenue who possesses some handsome diamonds. She puts them in a box, puts the box in a rag bag, puts the rag bag on the closet floor, and at night puts the watch dog in the closet on the top of the rag bag and locks him in there, and every night hides the key in a different place. Her husband says that if she had her way she would arm him to the teeth and put him in the closet with the dog.

Too Much for Him.

At the close of an amateur theatrical performance a gentleman was discovered in a fainting condition. Great beads of perspiration stood upon his brow, and his face was ashy white.

"Great heavens! what is the trouble?" was the excited inquiry.

"Ladies and gentlemen," gasped the unfortunate man, faintly, "I'm the author of the play."

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor, and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr. Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality, he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

—Every person doing a large business requires a heavy scale of five or ten tons capacity. And business competition is so keen that inventors are hard at work trying to keep up with the times to save time and labor, which are always capital to the most of our business men. It will weigh the coal and subtract the weight of the wagon from the load without the use of any figures. The town of Ridgetown and several other large corporations have purchased them recently.

—Although school is about closed for the summer holidays the following, which we clip from an exchange, will be read with interest by teachers, if not by parents: An interesting case has just been decided by Chief Justice Armour. A lady teacher in Ramsay township suspended a boy for misconduct—disobedience—until he should offer an apology. She was backed by the trustees, and the "Old Man" backed the boy by applying for a mandamus to compel his admittance. The judge dimissed the application, ordering the "Old Man" to pay all the cost. His Lordship said that the teacher and trustees were right, and that the father ought to have compelled his son to acknowledge he was wrong in what he did and to go quietly back to school.

He has supplied two cakes; one weighing 50lbs and the other 46. Both were handsome table ornaments, great taste being shown in the selection of the flowers, etc. And not only were they nice looking but the cake itself was A. 1. This THE EXPRESS can vouch for having been favored with a piece of the former. Photos of the two cakes Mr Davis has on exhibition in his parlors.

—Saturday last among the many teams standing on the market was Mr. Marshal Wagar's. Becoming frightened at a piece of paper flying about, the horses started out from their place in the row and turning west started to runaway with Mrs Wagar in the wagon. The commotion occasioned four other teams to start off, and it looked as though there was going to be a general stampede. Fortunately the four were checked in time to save damage. Not so with Mr Wagar's, however. They continued west, increasing their speed as they proceeded. Shortly after they cleared the other rigs, Mr G. W. Wagar, son of the owner, ran out and caught the rein of the off horse, but could not stop them. At the corner of Centre-st the horses turned north and in doing so threw the wagon almost entirely off the street. The young man was here thrown to the ground, and narrowly escaped being trampled on and run over. After throwing Mrs Wagar and the contents of the vehicle out, the wagon was carried on to the corner of Bridge-st, Here the horses took one on each side of the telegraph pole. Breaking the double tree in two the animals were free of the wagon. One was caught before proceeding further; the other continued north with G.W. after him as hard as he could run. The horse was captured on the common near the railroad track. Both animals were slightly hurt in the feet, but nothing serious. One hind wheel of the wagon was "dished" and the double-tree broken. Mrs Wagar, who was thrown on the sidewalk, was at first thought to be seriously injured as blood was running from her nose and she could not straighten up. A doctor being close at hand was immediately at her side, and had her assisted to Mr Smith's shop. On examination it was found that she was more stunned than injured. After resting a little she revived and when the rig was ready proceeded with her husband to the home in Camden. Mr. G. W. Wagar had his pants torn and received a bruise on the knee; otherwise he was not injured.

Mr Emsley's Farewell.

Sunday evening last the Rev W. H. Emsley occupied the pulpit of the Eastern Methodist church for the last time as pastor of the term just expired. The church was well filled, representatives being in attendance from each of the Protestant and R. C. churches. The opening hymn was the 612th and the reading lesson the 34th Psalm, both appropriate to the occasion, as was also the anthem, "Onward," by the choir. The text was Eph. 6 : 10—"Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might." It is needless to say that the discourse was a good one. Mr Emsley appeared to be fully at home as ever, although he at the close said that it was with considerable difficulty he preached. He reviewed the history of the church from its inception to the present age, and held Christ up as a noble example. He offered kind words of advice to the congregation—the young people were asked to select the best literature and avoid flippancy of life ; the church to avoid formality which stifles enthusiasm and to be strong in faith, in prayer and the consolation which history brings. The three years he had spent in Napanee had been three happy years. Although the work on his part had been inperfect, he had striven to exalt Jesus only—never to stand between Christ and man. Whilst in Napanee he had had many joys here it was that his greatest sorrow had come upon him—the death of his father. He thanked the friends, not only of his own congregation but of all for the very great kindness shown him. He hoped by the grace of God to meet all in the better land. The rev. gentleman closed with some good advice regarding the incoming pastor—receive him kindly, give him hearty sympathy and do not keep reminding him of the one just gone—and a prayer that heaven's choicest blessings might rest on all. Mr Emsley omitted the closing exercise and upon the voluntary, usually played during the lifting of the collection, being finished, arose and

CRICKET.

As announced the military cadets of Kingston visited Napanee on Saturday last and played a game with our cricketers in the afternoon. It was a day off for scoring, particularly with Napauee, as will be seen by the score given below. The local team won the game by four wickets.

Mr Emsley omitted the closing exercise and upon the voluntary, usually played during the lifting of the collection, being finished, arose and addressing the congregation, said: "I again wish you all good bye; may God bless you" and decended the platform

Yesterday the rev. gentleman and his family left for their new home at Brockville. They were escorted to the station by a number of friends. In Mr Emsley, Napanee loses a good man—a man respected, not because of his ability as a minister only, but for his many other good qualities. All join in wishing him every success on his new field.

DEATH'S DOINGS.

SHARP.

Saturday last death removed from our midst a well known figure, in the person of old Mr. Robt Sharp. About two weeks ago the old gentleman had a paralytic stroke, from which he never recovered, although not completely helpless. He was quite conscious up to the last and died quite easily. For over twenty years Mr. Sharp was a resident of Napanee, and worked here at the tailoring during a considerable portion of the time. For the last two years he has been very stooped, but up to that time was an exceedingly upright figure. He was born at Quebec and at an early age started out to see the world for himself, travelling through a great portion of Canada and many of the States. Mr. Sharp leaves a wife and only daughter, Mrs W. A. Baker, to mourn his loss.

ROE.

Wednesday Mr Alex H. Roe, third son of the late A. H. Roe, M. P. P., died at Wingham, in his nineteenth year. Alex had been poorly all winter and at Easter give up teaching, which he had followed for some time—the first year at the school on the Kingston road east of Napanee and latterly at Mount Pleasant school, on the Belleville road—with the view of recruiting. He commenced to improve and his many friends thought that he would soon be in his usual health. About a month ago he left for Wingham to spend a time with the family of his uncle, Alfred Roe, Esq. Nothing unfavorable was heard until a week ago when word was received that he had had a bad attack of what the doctor said was bronchial asthma. His eldest sister at that time proceeded to Wingham and was pleased to send word that he had recovered and was out of danger. By the noon mail of Wednesday his mother received a letter penned by himself stating that he felt as well as when he left here. The feelings of the mother can be better imagined than described when we state that in the evening word was received that he had been again attacked and half an hour after another telegram announcing his death. Miss Roe, along with the uncle, accompanied the remains to Napanee on last night's train. The funeral will take place to-day at 2 p.m. from the house, Centre-st, to the church of England; thence to the Napanee cemetery.

CULHANE.

Another of our young men departed this life this week, in the person of Mr Wm Culhane. For some time he had been ailing from that generally fatal disease, consumption. Last fall he visited Denver, Col., for the benefit of his health, but it did not appear to do him any good. About two months ago he returned and since has been visiting friends here and at Deseronto. At the time of his death he was stopping at his uncle's, Mr McCallum, at the Indian Woods, near Deseronto. The funeral took place yesterday afternoon, the remains being interred in the R. C. cemetery here.

The first bid was by Thompson, 8¾ for the board, which ran up to 9¼ by Bartlett, after which selections were made.

All the factories having colored accepted Thompson's bid of 9¾, except Conway and Centreville.

Bath accepted Thompson's offer of 9½.

Bartlett's offer of 9½ was accepted by Platt.

Centreville and Conway sold to Downey for 9⅞c.

McCargar bought Napanee's make of white at 9½c.

Bartlett's offer of 9½ for Amherst Island, subject to inspection at Montreal, was accepted.

THE NEW POST OFFICE.

The Address to the Ministers—The Document Placed in the Stone—Banquet Notes.

Following is the full text of the address read by Mayor Cook to the Ministers at the laying of the corner stone of the new post office on Thursday of last week:

To Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works, and Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, Minister of Customs:

Honorable Sirs,—We, the mayor and members of the corporation of the town of Napanee, desire hereby to express to you our kindly feelings in this your official visit to our town.

It has seldom been our privilege to entertain Ministers of the Crown, and it is with more than ordinary pleasure that we this day extend to you a cordial welcome, so closely identified as you are with the great work of Confederation.

The result of your efforts, gentlemen, and those of your colleagues is that we have to day the Dominion of Canada embracing half a continent and spanned by the most extensive and magnificent railway system in the entire world.

Under your administration our seafaring facilities are prominently utilized, our water stretches brought into practical usefulness, and the commerce of our country has been steadily increased until our influence is now felt and acknowledged throughout both the eastern and western hemispheres.

But it is pleasing to know, gentlemen, that amid the great questions which must of necessity occupy your attention our wants here are not forgotten.

The beautiful edifice which, on behalf of the government, you are presenting to us to-day, will stand as a monument of your good will towards the County of Lennox, the pioneer district of the Province of Ontario.

We trust, Honorable Sirs, that your visit here will be most pleasant and agreeable, and that you will never have cause to regret the sacrifice which you must of necessity have made in honoring us this day with your presence.

The Banquet

at the Campbell House, was, if anything worse than the afternoon's "entertainment". Perhaps we should qualify this. If we take Worcester for it, a banquet is a feast. This there was on Thursday night, for mine host Johnson had even excelled his former efforts in this line. The bill of fare would be difficult to excell, Mr Johnson being complimented on all hands. Mrs Johnson also came in for considerable praise, the table decorations being such as to call forth encomiums. The large dining hall looked exceedingly pretty, being nicely decorated with bunting and flags. A portrait of Sir John hung at the head of the room. We previously said that if we take Worcester as authority for the meaning of a banquet there is no room for questioning. If, however, we take it in its more modern acceptance it was an absolute failure. The management was defective throughout. Finding that the running of things on political grounds during the afternoon was unpopular, the Wilson-Lapum clique endeavored to swing the banquet into a citizens' affair. It was no go, however. Notwithstanding that for two days previous different individuals did their best to sell the [illegible] tickets had to be given away in order that fifty (the number guaranteed Mr Johnson) might be made up. We are credibly informed that 51 sat down at the tables. As, according to the local Tory organ, "the attendance included the

We could if we felt inclined, make the assemblage look more ridiculous; suffice it to say that, taking out those who are directly interested in the new building, forty were present and in that number are included a number of parties who received complimentary tickets. In other words, the Tory Beaver notwithstanding, the gathering was not a representative one, of either the town or district, and on Wilson, Lapum & Co lies the blame.

After the good things had been partaken of, the following toasts were proposed and responded to in the order given: "The Queen", by the Venerable Archdeacon Bedford-Jones; "Her Majesty's Ministers" was responded to by Messrs Langevin and Bowell; "Those who have been instrumental in bringing the wants of the town to the notice of the Ministers", by Mr M. W. Pruyn, ex-M.P. and Uriah Wilson; "The Architect and Contractor", by Messrs G. Neelands, F. Bartlett and Geo Cliff; "The Corporation", Mayor Cook; "The Ladies" Messrs G. W. Goodwin, Jas E. Herring, and A. A. Richardson.

The Record.

The record placed in the stone read as follows:

The corner stone of this building was laid on the 21st day of June, 1888, in the fifty-second year of the reign of Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, by the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin and Hon. Mackenzie Bowell.

The cost of the building is estimated at $30,000 and is erected by the government of the Dominion of Canada for the accomodation of the following offices in the town of Napanee: Post office, custom house, inland revenue office, gas inspectors office, weights and measures inspectors office, customs examining warehouse.

The contractor is George Neelands, Esq., of the city of Kingston; Thos. Fuller, Esq., of the Public Works Department, Ottawa, is chief architect; Frederick Bartlett, of Napanee, is local architect; James E. Herring, Napanee, is clerk of works.

The Governor General of the Dominion of Canada is Baron Stanley, of Preston, in the Peerage of Great Britain.

The cabinet ministers are Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, K.C.B., Premier, etc., etc.; Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, Minister of Public Works; Hon. J. H. Pope, Minister of Railways; Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, Minister of Customs; Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron, Minister of War; Hon. John Carling, Minister of Agriculture; Hon. John Costigan, Minister of Inland Revenue; Hon. J. S. D. Thompson, Minister of Justice; Hon. J. A. Chapleau, Secretary of State; Hon. G. A. Foster, Minister of Finance; Hon. C. H. Tupper, Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Uriah Wilson, Esq., is sitting member for the riding of Lennox and John W. Bell, Esq., for the riding of Addington in the House of Commons.

The members of the Legislative Assembly, Toronto, are: W. W. Meacham, Esq., M. D., for Lennox and John S. Miller, Esq., for Addington.

The Dominion officials resident in Napanee, are W. H. Wilkison, Esq., Judge of the county court of Lennox and Addington, chairman of the general sessions of the peace and revising barrister for the electoral division of Addington. Gilbert Bogart, Esq., Postmaster; G. M. Elliott, collector of customs; Chas. B. Perry, landing waiter in H. M. Customs; W. L. Hamilton, Esq., inspector of inland revenue for the district of Kingston; Fleming Rowland, Esq., collector of inland revenue, division of Kingston.

The members of the municipal council of the town of Napanee are H. L. Cook, Esq., M. D., mayor; T. G. Carscallen, Esq., Reeve; E. S. Lapum, Esq., deputy reeve. Councillors: East Ward, John Fennell, Wilder Joy and W. T. Gibbard; West Ward, Chas. Lane, W. D. Madden and [illegible] Centre Ward, Jabial Arlington, Jas. Wilson and Jas. Hanley.

giving the names of the cabinet ministers, town officials, etc., was the penmanship of Mr. Jas. E. Herring, who has been privileged to write a number of similar documents. It is needless to say it was well done; more like printing than writing.

The deceit displayed in the management was even shown in the address. It was no wonder that there were expresions of surprise when the following clause was read: "The result of your efforts, gentlemen, and those of your colleagues, is that we have to-day the Dominion of Canada," etc., etc. The listeners naturally asked what had Bowell to do with confederation. He did not sit in the House until the year the united Provinces set out as the Dominion of Canada.

Reasons for the Fizzle.

As everything, as far as weather, etc, was concerned, was favorable to a great gathering it is quite natural that the people should ask "Why the Fizzle?" The reasons are numerous.

First and foremost it was through the conceit of Uriah Wilson, Ed. Lapum and Capt. Holmes, who undertook to run the affair themselves without consulting the other members of the committee; in fact they put on at least two names without even asking their consent.

Another reason is that it was run as a political affair. At first it was to be non-political, but Wilson and Lapum thought they could see a "boom" in it for themselves and took it in their own hands; as a consequence the people felt reluctant to aid them in working up a scheme for their own benefit.

The unsatisfactory manner in which replies were given to the query: "Is Sir John coming?" created distrust. Had Lapum and Wilson taken the townspeople into their confidence a much larger crowd would have been present, even had it been definitely announced that only Langevin and Bowell would speak.

The promises of Sir John and his following, re good times and crops, had much to do with the fizzle. Farmers felt sorely at the promises made but unfulfilled, and naturally kept aloof from anything that would tend to show their sympathy for the party in power.

The keeping of The Express in the dark concerning the affair had no little tendency to weaken the confidence of the public. When Lapum, as secretary, was asked for information, his reply was "Oh! Sir John, Hector and Mackenzie Bowell will be here." Had politics not been introduced there was no reason to withold information from the Reform journal. On the other hand, every reason that all information be furnished.

Another reason, and not the least either, was that the people had lost confidence in Lapum, through the mismanagement of the demonstration last year, and the utter disregard Wilson had for the state of the people when making his speech on commercial union in the House.

Many more reasons could be given, all pointing to the incompetency of Wilson and Lapum. These are sufficient, however.

...ere said to be given away—in order that fifty (the number guaranteed Mr Johnson) might be made up. We are credibly informed that 51 sat down at the tables. As, according to the local Tory organ, "the attendance included the leading gentlemen of the district," we give the names of those who were present and alongside those who were not present :

Notes.

More flags were displayed than on the 24th May.

The absence of drunkenness throughout the day was quite noticeable.

The Ministers were driven round town during the afternoon by Mayor Cook.

The Ministers were guests at the Huffman House. It was decorated for the occasion.

The address to the Ministers was neatly penned by Mr. J. W. Robinson of Robinson & Co.

The near approach of the Ministers was announced by some tramp horn and bag pipe players and some harpers.

The reformers were hinted at as being pollywogs by Mackenzie Bowell. Think of a citizens' banquet after that!

The "record" above is an exact copy of the document placed in the stone. THE EXPRESS is the only paper giving it.

Had it not been for the townspeople there would have been very few more than can be seen on an ordinary Tuesday market day.

THE EXPRESS inserted in the stone was a copy of the issue containing the difficult nuts to crack given Uriah and his importations.

The 47th batt band came up from Ganaoque camp and played for the occasion. They were entertained at supper at the Campbell House.

Many were the expressions of dissapointment at the turn things had taken. What should have been a great demonstration amounted to nothing.

It will be noticed that the name of Hon. Mr. McLelan, the late incompetent Finance Minister, and more recently Postmaster General, was left out of the document placed in the stone.

A noticeable "feature" of the day was the absence of cheering. During the laying of the stone there was not a cheer until a Reformer suggested one; then several faint ones followed.

One thing that must have been distasteful to Uriah was the credit given by Mackenzie Bowell to M. W. Pruyn, M. P., as the first to move in the way of securing the post office for Napanee.

Alex Henry and Uriah Wilson, M. P., accompanied Messrs Langevin and Bowell to Deseronto, where they were guests of Mr E. W. Rathbun until the departure of the str. Deseronto for Trenton.

Several of the committee of the day did not even receive an invitation to the banquet and others did not know they were on until after the banquet they saw a bill of fare with their names on.

The whole thing was a failure from beginning to end; thanks to Uriah Wilson and Ed Lapum. Had they consulted the members of the committee it would have been otherwise. They chose, however, to run the show themselves and a fizzle of fizzles it proved.

The document placed inside the stone, people when making his speech on commercial union in the House.

Many more reasons could be given, all pointing to the incompetency of Wilson and Lapum. These are sufficient, however.

CHEESE.

1,500 boxes sold at Ingersoll on the 26th for 9¼.

The highest price paid at Peterboro board on Wednesday was 9¾.

Two more cases have been before the Belleville police magistrate for tampering with milk. Judgment has been reserved.

On our supplement will be found the judgment of the police magistrate at Belleville in the case of Prof. Whitton against H. Lennox, for skimming and diluting milk, alluded to by Mr. McCargar at the meeting of the cheese board here last week. It should be read by all furnishing factories with milk.

A few days ago a couple of individuals met in THE EXPRESS office and commenced an argument regarding cream and milk in the manufacture of cheese. One contended that much of what was in the bulletins lately sent out was all "fudge" and that cream would not make cheese; that cream during the process of manufacture was carried away, the milk making the cheese. The other held that it was all-important that the cream be retained in the milk; the quality of the cheese depending greatly upon the richness of the milk. Our dairy editor held to the latter opinion, but not considering himself sufficiently versed to give a decided view, submitted the question to Prof. Robertson, of the Agricultural College. Here is his reply:

DEAR SIR,—Your letter of enquiry of 18th inst, has been duly received.

When fat is removed from milk by skimming, or withheld by the keeping back of the strippings, two effects are at once noticeable in the cheese made from such milk. A larger quantity of milk is required to yield a pound of cheese; and the cheese is of inferior quality. The fat of milk is present in the shape of small globules, held in suspension by the milk serum. When milk is set these globules rise to the top and mainly constitute the cream. When milk is coagulated for cheese making the curd encases the globules and holds them in its own body. A small per cent. of them escapes in the whey, being rubbed off the surface of the pieces of cut curd. Fine Canadian cheddar cheese has at least 30 per cent. of its weight made up by these fat globules. You will thus see that when they are removed very much less cheese can be made from a given quantity of milk. The cheese will also be inferior in richness of body and flavor as the natural flavor of milk mainly resides in the fat. I am, yours truly,

Why Baking Powders are Best.

(From Hall's Journal of Health)

Baking powders properly compounded and containing pure cream of tartar, are more convenient than yeast; and bread and pastry made with them are just as wholesome and far more palatable.

We are in entire sympathy with the manufacturers of the Royal Baking Powder—who commenced and are vigorously conducting the war against the use of adulterated baking powders.

Before committing ourselves, however, we made tests of a sufficient number of baking powders to satisfy ourselves that the substitution of alum for cream of tartar in their composition had not been over-estimated, while a careful examination of the Royal Baking Powder confirms our belief that Dr. Mott, the government chemist, when he singled out and commended this powder for its wholesomeness did it wholly in the interests of the public.

We do not hesitate to say that the Royal Baking Powder people deserve the gratitude of the community whom they are endeavoring to protect.

CHAPTER XXII.—Mr. Beeching's Ultimatum.

Mr. Beeching took a hansom and drove to a street off Cavendish-square, a street well known to all the best dressed women in London. As he drove along he debated what he should do for Mrs. Baddeley. He was so inherently a man of business—albeit he had never soiled his fingers with the grime of a city office—that it irked him to fling a hundred pounds into this harpy's maw, as a sop is flung to Cerberus. It would please him better to make some kind of bargain with the harpy, even if the transaction should cost him more than a hundred pounds. He wanted to get some advantage for his money.

He sent his card to Mrs. Ponsonby, and was at once admitted into the very sanctuary of the house near Cavendish-square—the lady's private room, study, office, or boudoir, which ever she might prefer to call it; and here he was recieved with gracious smiles by Mrs. Ponsonby herself.

She needed no explanation of his errand, for she had seen him in attendance upon the handsome Mrs. Baddeley at race-meetings and other places of public resort, whither Mrs. Ponsonby went occasionally to see how the world was using her customers. It was there that she made up her mind about all her doubtful patronesses, as to how far they might be worthy of her confidence. That which she saw at Hurlingham or at Sandown served as the chart by which she steered in dangerous seas. In the dressmaker's estimation of Mrs. Baddeley—whose acount was a bagatelle compared with other accounts—Mr. Beeching was an important factor. He had never crossed her threshold until to-day, and she felt pleased with herself for having written the letter that had brought him there.

She was not so pleased, however, after a quarter of an hour's conversation with Mr. Beeching.

Of money on account he would not give her a sixpence. If she were prepared to settle her account upon equitable terms, say thirty-three per cent., he would give her his cheque and take Mrs. Baddeley a receipt in full of all demands. If she were not disposed to accept this offer, she must look to Mrs. Baddeley alone for her money. He would have nothing to do with it. He knew what dressmaker's bill's were, and the usurious profits they exacted. He was assured that thirty-three per cent. would pay for all that she had supplied, and leave a margin of profit. At any rate that was his ultimatum. Mrs. Baddeley had given him plenary powers. As for the gowns for this evening, Mrs. Baddeley could do very well without them. It was by her acting, not by her costume she was to please her audience. It was not to be supposed that he was to be frightened into paying an exorbitant account.

Mrs. Ponsonby held out for a long time. She was not in the habit of compromising an account. She was in no immediate want of money. She meant to have her due. Mrs. Baddeley would be obliged to pay her.

"My good soul, it is all very well to talk," replied Mr. Beeching, who was more at his ease in a business interview than in society; "but can you get blood out of a stone? Mrs. Baddeley has not a penny piece in the world. She is living upon her dressmaker's credit, and upon the generosity of her friends. She has not a penny piece in the world. Her husband left her nothing but debts. Her settlement was a few hundreds a year, which he had anticipated before his death. Mrs. Baddeley

Baddeley would be obliged to pay her.

"My good soul, it is all very well to talk," replied Mr. Beeching, who was more at his ease in a business interview than in society; "but can you get blood out of a stone? Can you get nine hundred pounds out of an officer's wife—a lady whose husband is being roasted alive at Candahar or somewhere, in order to keep body and soul together. You have made your mistake in trusting a lady in Mrs. Baddeley's sad position, and you ought to think yourself uncommonly lucky if you get a clear third of your account, without law expenses or bother of any kind."

"Mrs. Baddeley may not have money, but she has friends," argued the dressmaker, doggedly.

"No doubt she has friends—hosts of friends—but I take it I am the only one among 'em who would pay six and eight pence in the pound to get her out of difficuty. One thing I can assure you, Mrs. Ponsonby, I won't pay seven shillings. I have made my final offer."

He had his cheque-book in the breast pocket of his summer overcoat, the end showing distinctly against the silk lining. He touched the book lightly as he spoke, and that touch decided Mrs. Ponsonby.

She had felt some uneasiness about Mrs. Baddeley's account, and it was something to get the cost price of her materials, with the credit of having dressed a lady who was known and admired in a particular set, and who had brought Mrs. Ponsonby a good deal of custom.

I should be sorry to disoblige a lady for whom I have a great liking," she said, with a patronising air; "and rather than do that I will accept your cheque."

"And give me a receipt in tull of all demands?"

"Yes, so far as the account you have there. The gowns that are to be delivered this afternoon are not in that account."

"What are they to cost?"

Mrs. Ponsonby looked at a document on her Davenport.

"Seventy-seven pounds eighteen shillings and ninepence."

"I'll add thirty-five to your cheque, and you can cross Mrs. Baddeley out of your books altogether."

"What! I am to take a third of my account and to lose my customer?"

"Not at all. She says there is no one in London but you who can make her a gown. She will go on dealing with you I have no doubt; but if she takes my advice she will always pay ready money, and always know what she is going to pay when she gives the order. You'll both of you find the system ever so much pleasanter."

"Not if my prices are to be cut down in this way," replied Mrs. Ponsonby.

There was a further discussion, but Mr. Beeching's logic and his cheque-book prevailed. He wrote his cheque, got the two receipted accounts, saw the milliner's basket deposited on the top of a cab, with a young woman in charge of it, and then drove back to Wilkie Mansions. He passed the four-wheeler and the big basket before he reached the Park.

Mrs. Baddeley was in her drawing-room, pale, anxious, but lovely, in a Japanese tea-gown, lime-blossom green, under a cloud of coffee-coloured lace.

"Dearest Beeching, have you got me my gowns?" she gasped, with clasped hands as he stood just within the doorway.

Tory, always eager to distinguish himself, rushed at the half open door and banged it, and then came back to his mistress on his hind-legs to ask for his accustomed reward of biscuit or sugar, but Leo was too agitated to think of Tory.

"Your gowns will be here in ten minutes, I passed them on the road. Could you

Helen and Sir Adrian were going in just in front of him, amongst a fashionable crowd. His stall was next but one to Helen's, and St. Austell occupied the seat between them.

"How odd that we should be side by side," said his lordship, loud enough for Lady Belfield to hear.

Helen made no answer. She was not yet mistress of those arts of hyprocisy which enable a woman to glide from flirtation to flirtation, and from intrigue to intrigue, with a bold front and a lofty crest. She had not passed the border line of guilt, and yet her head was bent by the burden of conscious shame. That slight droop of the head, and languid pensive air enhanced her beauty, in an age when brazen mirthfulness is the commonest attitude of woman. She had a fragile look, like a tall white lily bent almost to breaking. Some of her friends said she looked consumptive and would not last many seasons.

She knew that St. Austell had taken infinite trouble to get that stall next to her's. He had been with her at tea-time to find out the number of her seat—had been with her, they two alone, in the Japanese drawing-room—without even a Tory to make a diversion from perilous sentimentality—and then driven off to the Hall in a hansom to get his own number exchanged; and now he expected her to act surprise.

"Masks and Faces" was listened to with politeness and appropriate applause by people who remembered Fanny Sterling in the heyday of her charms as Peg Woffington; by people who could hardly dissociate the character from Mrs. Bancroft, and by other people who had seen Mrs. Bernard Beere. As for Mrs. Baddeley, her diamonds and her gowns were lovely. Her acting was easy and refined, and utterly undramatic; but she was above the level of her fellow performers, and was supposed by them and by herself to be taking the town by storm. Applause is given so freely to amateurs, since approval means nothing and compromises nobody. People who have been coaxed into buying guinea stalls for an old familiar play, must at least pretend to enjoy themselves, and the audience was fashionable, and could console itself with the idea that it was the right thing to be there.

Lady Belfield and her daughter-in-law parted in the vestibule. Helen was going on to a party in Regent Terrace with her sister. She had to go to Mrs. Baddeley's dressing-room and wait there while that lady changed her dress, which would be rather a long business no doubt. St. Austell offered to take her to her sister's room, but Adrian gave her his arm, as if by a superior right.

"If you'll take care of my mother, I'll be back in a few minutes," he said to St. Austell, as he walked off with Helen.

It was the first time she had touched his arm since they were affianced lovers, and her fingers trembled faintly as they rested on his sleeve. She had so many causes for agitation that night. St. Austell's pursuit, unobtrusive, but fatal: her fear of her husband's return, which might occur at any moment; and now her dread of this grave, earnest brother-in-law, whom she had wronged in the past, and whom she shrank from in the present as from one who had an occult power to read her heart.

"You are looking pale and tired, Helen," said Adrian, as they went along a passage leading to the back of the Hall, "Must you really go to a party to-night?"

"I am due at two. There is Lady Glandore's musical evening, which I would not miss for worlds, and a dance afterwards—a late dance— which means coffee and carriages at six o'clock to-morrow morning."

"I believe you are killing yourself with this kind of life.

"Oh, but it is only a spurt: it lasts so short a time. 'A rose's brief bright life of joy,' as somebody has said."

As a result of the "Victoria" and "Waubuno" disasters, both the engines and hulls of all Canadian passenger vessels on the great lakes are inspected, and the number of passengers they may carry is fixed by competent authorities, so that in this respect Canada is in advance of the United States. Unfortunately, however, for the sailors, there is no Government inspection of the hulls of vessels engaged in carrying freight, nor is there any attempt at regulating the manner in which these vessels are loaded. The disinclination of the underwriters to insure a vessel that is so rotten as to be too great a risk, has, doubtless, a certain effect for good, but in many cases it simply drives unseaworthy vessels out of the hands of responsibls shipowners into those of unscrupulous men, who may be clever enough to place the risk and make money out of the loss of the vessel. The tendency to overload even sound vessels upon the lakes, where for days together the water is as smooth as that of a mill pond, is very great, especially when rates are low. When a few hundred bushels extra makes all the difference between a profitable trip and a dead loss, the captain that will not run the risk of a "snorter" catching him is much more prudent than are the most of the lake men. When a craft, unseaworthy through lack of strength, sail area, or steam power, is sadly overloaded, it does not require very much of a gale to produce a disaster. A barge foundered in Lake Ontario a short time ago, which was simply a floating coffin, and within a few days a small schooner went down in the same lake within fifteen miles of her port of departure, having been fatally injured by merely touching the bottom. It is not wonderful, therefore, that the lake sailors should have asked Parliament to insist upon the inspection of hulls and rigging, boats and life preservers, and the establishment of a "Plimsoll's mark" on the great lakes. Mr. Foster, late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has, since Parliament adjourned, promised them a bill which will bring this about, and it is to be hoped that the Americans will take similar action.

The Beef-Eater are the Bosses.

The history of the whole world shows that the beef-eating peoples of the world are foremost in peace and war, art and science. That has been the history of our race, and will be to the end of recorded time. .... In Great Britain the average consumption of each individual was 105 pounds per annum, in France 74 pounds, in Germany 69 pounds, in Russia 48 pounds, in Italy 23 pounds, in Austria 64 pounds, in Spain 49 pounds, in Scandinavia 67 pounds, and in United States 120 pounds. In Great Britain the consumption annually was 105 pounds, and in the United States 120 pounds so that the two great English-speaking peoples of the world, the foremost in empire and civilization, Great Britain and the United States, are the largest beef consumers of the nations upon the face of the earth

"There's never any flies on our butter, madam."

Then the old lady, whose knowledge of English is limited, said:

BY E. H. S.

Thou secret of another world!
Tossed flaming from thy troubled rest;
Unerringly through darkness hurled
On this strange planet's syl an breast.
Pray tell me of thy silvery course,
Across the unending universe.
Didst hear the musick of the spheres,
Accompanying the chaunt of years?
Sad meteor in thy course through night,
Didst see the hosts arrayed in white?
The spectre dead of earth that hover
About it, whirling on through space;
Keeping for aye an equal pace,
Beneath night's murk, and day's blaze cover.
Hissing awhile with fury heat,
Soon cold thou growest at my feet;
Thy fiery hue is fading fast,
Thy strange unearthly look has passed,
The change grows more and more complete;
Now thou art black and cold at last.

Through thy swift passage through the sky,
Thou wast watched by a maiden's eye;
She watched thee from the dewy grove
And breathed a tender wish of love:
For Hylas was the gentle sigh,
And still she held her eyes above,
"You were not kind to him yestern,"
Said mystick memory in turn—
"He loves you still" the same voice said;
The maiden dropped her gentle head,
And held her white hand to her breast,
The fluttering heart that would not rest;
She whispered "would indeed that I
Had been more kind by being less shy;
By yonder blazing orb that fell,
I felt full more than I would tell;
I love poor Hylas all in all,
Oh would that he might hear me call;—
But hark! the clinging thicket stirred,
The woven branches broke asunder,
A voice said, "Sweet, I heard each word,
Nor fly away in timorous wonder.
My heart was sore and so I came
To be near thee and dream away
Into the night my piteous flame,
And only leave you to the day—
But oh, I love you, I was weary,
Confronted with my heart alone,
I did not mean to hear, when here I
Came wandering, but I heard you moan
And couldn't help what I have done—"
'Twas Hylas, and the beauteous maid
Blushed at the words that he had said,
Nor unto Hylas would she own,
The soft words spoken when alone.
But he had seen into her heart,
And seen it and had heard it speak;
Love taught him better far than art:
He only kissed her tender cheek.
Kisses draw love from where it lingers;
It shines in eyes and darts from fingers.

Thou silent meteor lying so,
Thy ebon night sky was thy bridge;
And little, little didst thou know
Thou came to be a lover's pledge.

But, ho, there was a sadder scene
Here in the sombre earth's demesue.
The little stars that brightly glitter,
The streaks of stars and myriads there,
That deckt the pale moon's golden litter,
Looked down upon a dead man's bier.
With burning, sunken, fevered eye,
The dying soldier swept the sky;
He thought again of war's and battle;
He heard again the drum's wild rattle.
Ere death we go back o,er life's story
And flush with its forgotten glory.
The moon shone, he gazed long at her,
As thou, swift-pinioned meteor
Flashed by, he gasped and dropped his head,
Whispering—"My Death Star," and was dead

Oh messenger from worlds unknown!
Traverser o' the skies alone!
Mysterious secret, tangible.
What is thy mute strange-hidden spell?
Herald of love and death!—Oh hold your
Hot wings of fire—Death to the soldier
That pillar like for a nation stood—
And love to children in the wood.

Summer Twilight.

BY J. R. WILKINSON

I sit at the twilight hour
Just where the roses sleep;
And the thoughts that come unto me
Are, oh! so calm and sweet.
I list for the sound of a footfall
I know will come to me,
At the golden glow of sunset,
When shadows steal o'er the sea.

And restful, and soul-refreshing
As dew to the drooping flower;
Inwardly invigorating,
Imparting new life and power.
And thus removed from the turmoil
Of day, with its din and strife;

A $60,000,000 W. W. Scheme.

The people of Paris, France, are discussing a scheme submitted by a Swiss engineer to the municipality for furnishing the city with an ample supply of drinking water from Lake Neufchatel, Switzerland, at a cost of $60,000,000. The distance between the lake of Neufchatel and Paris 312 miles, and the surface of the lake is 1,620 feet higher than the mean level of Paris, its total area covering 140 square miles. This vast body of water, even if it were not replenished, would be sufficient to supply Paris for two years at the rate of 133 gallons per head per day, the level of the lake falling no more than three feet, and the water would arrive in Paris at a temperature of 50 degrees Fahrenheit. It is not proposed to take the water from the surface of the lake, but to draw it off by an underground heading 262 feet below the surface of the lake, where it has a temperature of only 43 degrees. The water would be taken through a tunnel twenty-two miles long under the Jura Mountains to the Dessoubre valley, in the department of the Doubs, and thence in an arched conduit along the slopes of the hills to Paris, where it would arrive still at an elevation of 394 feet. As the present reservoirs of Paris have an elevation of only 295 feet, raising the fall, or pressure, by 100 feet, with a flow of 4,400 gallons per second, would give a tremendous motive power.

The Use of Spectacles.

A vast amount of popular misapprehension and prejudice exists as to the use of spectacles. Many persons who need them object to wearing them for various reasons. Some fear that it will lead their friends to suspect that they are getting old. Others think it will cause them to be suspected of wishing to appear learned or cultured. Some persons do not want to begin to wear them lest, having acquired the habit, they may not be able to leave them off or to see well without them. Others, again, object to glasses only on account of their inconvenience. I have personally met with many of all these classes of persons, but I have frequently heard of another class that I have never met with, namely, those who do not need glasses, but who wear them just for effect and to attract attention. Now, the simple truth is that there are just two good reasons for wearing spectacles, and only two. One is that we may see better, the other is that our eyes may be relieved of strain. Often both these reasons are combined in the same case.—Professor David Webster, M. D.

Eli Perkins Was Too Funny.

Eli Perkins, the humorist, was too humorous the other day. He wrote a letter to D. W. Caldwell, the general manager of the Nickel Plate railway line, asking for a pass to Chicago. Thinking to be funny he added this postscript:—"P. S. I enclose you $5—if you can find it." Mr. Caldwell is a generous but somewhat austere man. He answered the letter in due course of business, ostensibly granting the favour, but inclosing no pass. Here is the postscript he added to his reply: P. S. "I enclose you pass—if you can find it." Eli had been too funny.—Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

The Effect of Too Much Education.

"I understand you ran away from a polecat the other night," said Colonel Yerger to Sam Johnsing.

"Dat's jess what I did."

"With considerable alacrity, I suppose, when you learned the nature of the animal."

"No, sah, with contrifugal force, sah," replied Sam, who is attending a night school.

"Centrifugal force! What do you know about that?"

STATISTICS.

The great Montezuma irrigating tunnel, in Colorado, has been completed. This tunnel is over a mile long and runs under one of the ranges of the mountains composing the Rockies. With the fifty miles of canal, it will convey the water of the Dolores river over the richest agricultural valley in Colorado. Over 200,000 acres of land will be reclaimed by this enterprise.

The total mileage of pipes for natural gas in the United States is not far from 2,000 miles, not including small pipes for individual use. One-fifth of this quantity of pipes is laid in the city of Pittsburg. The gas wells of Pennsylvania produce from 1,500,000 to 15,000,000 cubic feet a day. High and low pressure wells are also found in Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, and as far west as Kansas. The total consumption of gas for 1887, as estimated by coal displacement, was equivalent to 10,000,000 tons of coal.

The Mississippi river is again on the rampage. Its great volume of water, swollen by the immense floods pouring down from its headwater tributaries in Minnesota and Wisconsin, is overflowing its banks and breaking through its levees, carrying widespread destruction in its course. That long, narrow valley, known as the Sny bottoms, lying between the river and the bluffs, a strip fifty miles by five of the richest land in the world except, perhaps, the Valley of the Nile, is now a lake, its crops destroyed, its hopeless and homeless people flying to the highlands, a million dollars' worth of crops upon which they depended for their coming year's sustenance ruined.

New York World:—The number of Americans going to Europe this year is greater than ever before. The Atlantic steamship companies are having all they can attend to, and could make use of many more vessels than they own. It is becoming, more and more clear that there is a brilliant future in store for Europe as an American summer resort. Though we have a population now of but 60,000,000 people, we already largely support the inhabitants of many interesting localities in the effete monarchies. By the time we reach 200,000,000 it can readily be understood that the energies of the Europeans will be mainly devoted to securing a living through making it pleasant for us over there during our pleasure tours and sojourns for health.

A recent dispatch from London says: "Russia is beginning to be regarded with particular suspicion. The latest reports say that she now has three corps of armed men on her western frontier. She has recently strengthened her navy and during the last month has shown a change in activity in the way of military preparation. It is now noted that Russia has a better opportunity for raiding the East than she has had for years. Germany is sorely troubled by the uncertain condition of the Emperor. England is unprepared for war, and has home-rule divisions at home to prevent harmonious action against swift aggressive action on the part of Russia towards the East. Germany has, through Bismarck, shown such conciliatory tendencies towards the Czar that Russia regards that country as good as neutral. Austria it does not care for, France is now an ally, Russian finances are at their worst, and might be remedied by the capture of a new territory. Outbreaks and insurrections are constantly being fomented by Russian agents in the East. It is believed here that Russia intends within the next month to make a positive showing of an aggressive Eastern policy. In financial circles great uneasiness is beginning to be felt.

In a recent lecture in London, England, Mr. T. D. Mocatti gave some interesting details respecting the present number of Jews

In nature's harmony.

O, sun, and sea, and shadow;
O, eve, with thy soft twilight;
I revel amid your splendor,
Enwrapt in deep delight.
Aleene, I await thy coming,
And the clasp of thy gentle hand;
To wander in blissful dreaming
Near Heaven's border-land

The Vehicle of Thought.

BY WILL T. JAMES.

As music floats upon the air
In undulating waves of sound,
So thoughts of savants swell and bear
Their import all the world around,
Launched with a mythic mercury's flight
Upon Illiteracy's dark night.

As knowledge in her chariot rides
Across the sable wilderness
Of Error, like a mist divides
Man's mental chaos, and the press—
The car in which she onward sweeps—
O'er bigot-builded barriers leap.

Gleaming with fire, its golden wheels
Reflect the splendor of the sun
Of Truth althwart a world that feels
Their emanations as they run,
Rejoicing as its fulgent glow
The paths of wisdom clearly show.

Each gilded spoke in brightness turns,
Diffusing radiance o'er the land;
While they o'ershadow him who spurns,
They crown with halos Caxton's band,
Adding more lustre to the name
Of him whose talents merit fame.

Speed on triumphant, ever fraught
With treasures rich as earth's best gem
Men but assimilate the thought
To wear the scholar's diadem.
Beneficence no more could bless
Mankind than with a pure, free press

He Knew What a Mountain Was.

It was in a Tar Flat school a week or two ago. The school teacher was worming the usual kind and amount of information out of the boys. At length she asked the question:

"What is a mountain?"

That seemed to stump the class for a minute. Finally a little hand was timidly held up.

"Well, do you know what a mountain is?"

"I guess I know."

"What is it?"

"It is a lot o' land pointin' up in the air."

In this century the population of London has increased fourfold and its area about fifteenfold. Every year some 70,000 fresh souls are added to the population by immigration or birth. Every ten years there is added to London by immigration alone the population of a city as large as Lisbon or Bristol; and by immigration and birth together there is added a population as large as that of St. Petersburg or Vienna.

"Centrifugal force! What do you know about that?"

She Thought So, Too.

"I think," said the minister, who was visiting a parishioner, "that it is easier to coax children than to drive them. Gentle words are more effective than harsh ones."

"I think so, too," said the lady tenderly. Then she raised her window and suddenly shouted to her boy; "Johnnie, if you don't come in out of that mud-puddle I'll break your back.

Giving Up a Career.

"I'm goin' to be a soldier, ma, when I grow up," said Bobby, as he crawled into bed, "and fight in wars and battles."

"All right, Bobby; now go to sleep."

In the morning she shook him for the fourth time and said;

"Bobby, you must get up; the idea of a soldier lying abed at this hour!"

"Well, ma," said Bobby, sleepily. "I've changed my mind about being a soldier."

The Air Better than the Words.

As the last note of "Comin' through the Rye" trembled on the air, she turned to her escort and said:

"Is it not exquisite, Col. Blood?"

"Ye-es," assented the Colonel, in a half-hearted tone of voice, "the air is fine, but down our way, Miss Breezy, we go in more for Bourbon, you know."

A curious sight was to see in Boston the other day during the rain a wet umbrella leaning against the wall outside a railway office. A country visitor did not wish to carry the dripping head protector within the precincts of the office, and there it remained for fully a half hour without molestation. Hundreds were the questive glances cast at the tempting article, and occasionally some pedestrian unsupplied with such protection would advance a step or two toward it, but would then draw back and go his way, evidently thinking it was a trap. Had the countryman left it inside the door, or in any less prominent place, it would undoubtedly have disappeared almost immediately upon leaving his hand, but there it was secure, and has probably settled the vexed question as to the safest place to leave an umbrella.

of an aggressive Eastern policy. In financial circles great uneasiness is beginning to be felt.

In a recent lecture in London, England, Mr. T. D. Mocatti gave some interesting details respecting the present number of Jews in the world, and their distribution. He estimated their whole number as between 8,000,000 and 10,000,000. Of these about 100,000 are found in the United Kingdom, seven-tenths of them living in London, Germany contains 600,000; France, 70,000; America, 500,000; Persia, from 40,000 to 50,000. Large numbers of them dwell in Northern Africa and Abyssinia, and there has been a large influx of Jews to Palestine during the present century from other parts of the Turkish dominions, and from Poland, Russia and Central Europe. The Turkish government shows entire toleration towards them, but is not favourable to their further immigration. Mr. Mocatti says the condition of the Jews in the Holy Land is not a happy one. There is but little outlet for their energies. A large number give themselves entirely up to Hebrew study, while the bulk of them eke out a miserable livelihood by small industries, apparently aided, but in reality intensified in pauperism, by the pernicious system of "Halukah" or distribution of alms sent from various countries, which are doled out among the Jewish population in small sums.

A Useful Invention.

A Prairie avenue inventor, who has six daughters, has applied for a patent on a parlour alarm clock. His application reads thus:—"What I claim is the combination and arrangement of the various cams, levers and gongs, in conjunction with wires, batteries and explosives, whereby the clock is made to sound a loud and distinct warning at 11 p.m., and at the end of five minutes thereafter to explode a charge of dynamite on the under side of the seat of each and every occupied chair in the room, substantially as and for the purposes set forth."—[Chicago Tribune,

An English provincial paper says that the Buffalo Billeries will be exhibited this summer in the borough of Erastina, in the Province of Staten Island, and that an expedition has been sent to the interior of the province to capture a number of wild Indians for the show.

It is said that no one can arrest the flight of Time; but who is there who is not able to stop a minute.

Activity is the price of strength. Tie your arm tight to your side, giving it no motion, and its strength will flee away from the conquering palsy. The oak, that king of trees, girds itself with giant might because it is full of activity; energy runs through a thousand roots gathering the strength of the soil and building it into the heart of the oak; activity runs through a million leaves and gathers the commerce of the air and the sunlight to enrich the strength of the magnificent giant. Man no less must be full of bustling, busy activity, else he cannot be strong in the years of life nor staunch in the tests of manhood.

NUTTIE'S FATHER.

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—NUTTIE'S KNIGHT.

"The night came on and the bairnies grat,
Their minnie aneath the mools heard that."

"LINDHURST, 4th July.—Philip Dutton to Miss Egremont. Found. Waterloo, 6.15."

"I knew he would," said Nuttie, with a strange quietness, but as she tried to read it to her father her voice choked, and she had to hand it to Annaple. But for the first time in her life she went up and voluntarily kissed her father's forehead. And perhaps it was for the first time in his life that the exclamation broke from him, "Thank God!"

Perhaps it was well that the telegram had not come earlier in the day, for Mr. Egremont was very restless, showing himself much shaken in nerves and spirits before the time for driving to the station, which he greatly antedated. Nuttie could hardly keep him in the carriage, and indeed had to persuade him to return thither, when he had once sprung out on the arrival of a wrong train.

And after all, when the train did come his blue spectacles were directed to the row of doors at the other end, and Nuttie was anxiously trying to save him from being jostled, when a voice said "Here!" and close beside them stood Mr. Dutton, with a little boy close by his side who looked up in her face and said "Sister!" It was said in a dreamy, almost puzzled way, not with the ecstatic joy Nuttie had figured to herself; and there was something passive in the mode of his hearing his father's "My boy, my boy!" Instinctively all turned to the harbour of the carriage; Mr. Dutton lifted Alwyn in, and as Nuttie received him, a pang shot across her, as she felt how light, how bony the little frame had become in these three weeks.

"Come in! Come back with us! Tell us all!" said Mr. Egremont, as Mr. Dutton was about to help him in.

"My dog," said Mr. Dutton, while Alwyn looked up from nestling in Nuttie's lap to say, "Mithter Button come. And Mothu!"

"We have room for him," said Mr. Egremont graciously. "Here, poor fellow."

"He has the right," said Mr. Dutton, "for he was the real finder."

And Monsieur, curly and shiny, occupied with great dignity the back seat beside his master, while Alwyn, in a silent but dreamy content, as if he only half understood where he was, rested against his sister's bosom with his hands in his father's.

"Come, old chap," said his father cheerily, "tell us all about it."

But Alwyn only shuddered a little, raised his eyelids slightly, and gave a tiny faint smile.

"I think he is very much afraid," said Mrs. Dutton. There was a good deal to be done to make him presentable this morning. You must forgive me for sacrificing his curls, there was nothing else to be done with them."

"Ah!" and Nuttie looked again. The boy was in a new, rather coarse, ready-made, sailor suit that hung loosely upon his little limbs, his hair was short, and he was very pale, the delicate rosy flush was quite gone, and with it the round outline of the soft cheek; and there were purple marks under the languid eyes. She bent down and kissed him saying, "Was Mr. Dutton nurse to you, Wynnie?"

He smiled again and murmured, "Mr. Dutton made me boy a ain."

After a question and answer or two as to main facts of place and time of the discovery, Mr. Dutton told his story.

"Yes," said Mr. Dutton; "I verily believe we might have missed one another, but Monsieur ran up to him and, as I was actually whistling him off, I heard a little voice say, 'Mothu! Mothu!' and saw they were—well, embracing one another, and then came 'Mithter Button, Mithter Button, oh, take me home!'"

Eager caressing hands were held out to Monsieur, who jumped off the seat to receive the pats and laudations lavished on his curly round pate, and had to be reduced to order before Mr. Dutton could answer the question whether he had any further difficulty or danger.

"I took him up in my arms, and a handsome truculent-looking woman burst out on me, demanding what I was about with her child. To which I answered that she knew very well he was no such thing. Her man came swaggering up, declaring impudently that I had better be off—but I believe he saw that the people who came round would not take his part, for he gave in much more easily than I expected. I explained as loud as I could that this was a gentleman's son who had been stolen from his nurse in the Park. The man began to protest that they had found him deserted, and taken him with them out of charity, requesting to be paid for his keep. So I thought it better to give them a sovereign at once, so as to have no further trouble, and get him away as fast as I could. The woman came after me, making further demands, but the sight of a policeman in the distance turned her back. I went up to him and explained. I found he knew all about the loss and the reward, and looked regretfully at my prize. We went back to the hotel, where I saw Alwyn to rights as well as I could, sent out for some clothes, such as the place would produce, and which at least, as he says, made a boy of him again. I'm afraid the process was rather trying from such unaccustomed hands, though he was very good, and he has been asleep almost all the way home, and, his senses all as in a dream bound up."

The heaviness—whether weariness or content, still continued. Alwyn seemed to find it too much trouble to talk, and only gave little smiles, more like his mother than himself. He clung quite desperately to his sister when Mark offered to lift him from the carriage, but nurse was close behind, and it was good to see the little arms stretched out, and the head laid on her shoulder, the hand put up to stroke her cheek, and the lips whispering "Wyn's own nursie." The jubilant greeting and triumphant procession with which he was borne upstairs seemed almost to oppress him. He appeared almost as if he was afraid of wakening from a happy dream, and his lively merriment seemed all gone; there were only beams of recognition and gladness at "Wyn's own nursery," "Wyn's own pretty cup," touching it as if to make sure it was real, and pleased to see the twisted crusts, his special treat.

But he could not eat much of them, and soon laid his head down as one weary, with the exhaustion of content; and nurse, who had allowed that Mr. Dutton had, considering all things, done much for the outward restoration of the daintiness of her recovered child, was impatient to give him the hot bath and night's rest that was to bring back the bright joyous Alwyn. So Nuttie only lingered for those evening prayers she had yearned after so sorely. When she held his mother's picture to him to be kissed, he raised his eyes to her and said: "Will she come to me at night now?"

"Who, my darling?"

"She, mother dear."

"Here's her picture, dear boy."

"Not only the picture - she came out of it when I cried, up on the nasty-smelling bundle in the van all in the dark."

the dining-room door was shut. "I must feast my eyes on him.

Annaple replied by throwing an arm round her and looking into her eyes, kissing her on each cheek, and then, as they reached the landing in the summer twilight, waltzing round and round that narrow space with her.

"You ridiculous person!" said Nuttie. "Do you mean that you saw!"

"Of course I did; I've seen ever so——"

"Nonsense! That's impossible——"

"Impossible to owls and bats perhaps, but to nothing else not to see that there was one sole and single hero in the world to you, and that to him there was one single being in the world; and that being the case——"

"But, Annaple, you can't guess what he has always been to me."

"Oh! don't I know?—a sort of Archbishop of Canterbury and George Heriot rolled into one. So much the more reason, my dear, I don't know when I've been so glad in my life than that your good times should be coming."

"They are come in knowing this! It is only too wonderful," said Nuttie, as they stood together among the plants in the little conservatory on the way upstairs. I always thought it insulting to him when they teased me about him."

"They did, did they?"

"My father, incited by poor Gregorio. Oh, Annaple! don't let any one guess till we know how my father will take it. What is it, Ellen?" as the nursery-maid appeared on the stairs.

"If you please, ma'am, Mrs. Poole would be glad if you are coming up to the nursery."

They both hastened up and nurse came out to meet them in the day nursery, making a sign to Ellen to take her place by the cot, and withholding the two ladies. She made them come as far off as possible, and then said that she was not at all satisfied about Master Alwyn. There had been the same drowsiness and disinclination to speak, and when she had undressed and washed him, he had seemed tender all over, and cried out and moaned as if her touch hurt him, especially on one side where, she felt convinced, there was some injury; but when she asked about it his eyes grew frightened and bewildered, and he only cried in a feeble sort of way, as if sobs gave him pain.

She had soothed him, and he had gone into his own bed with the same gentle languid gladness, but had presently begun moaning, and imploring in his sleep, wakening with screams and entreaties, "Oh, I'll do it! I'll try" and she thought him very feverish. Would it not be better that a doctor should see him?

Nurse was always an alarmist, and Nuttie could not help thinking that to wake the child to see a stranger to-night would only add to his terror and distress, while Annaple declared her entire belief that though no doubt the poor little fellow had been cruelly knocked about and bruised, a night's rest would probably restore his bright self, and make all that was past only like a bad dream. There was no judging to-night, and sleep was wonderful reparation to those little beings.

Then however the moans and murmurs began again, and now the awakening cry. They started forward, and as Nuttie came to the cot-side the child threw himself into her bosom with, "Sister! Sister! It is sister!" but his eyes grew round with terror at sight of Annaple, and clinging tightly to Nuttie, he gasped, "Send her away! don't let her touch me! Fan's not here!"

To tell him she was Cousin Annaple, Billy's mamma, had no effect; he did not seem able to understand, and she could only retire—nurse being thus convinced that to let him see another stranger to-night would only do

Dutton nurse to you, Wynnie?"

He smiled again and murmured, "Mr. Dutton made me boy a ain."

After a question and answer or two as to main facts of place and time of the discovery, Mr. Dutton told his story. "I did not effect much with my inquiries after the circuses. All I heard of were of too superior an order for kidnapping practices However, I thought the only way would be to haunt fairs and races, and look at their camp-followers. At a place in Hertfordshire I saw a performance advertised with several children as fairies, so I went to see it. I was soon satisfied that Alwyn was not there; but it struck me that I had known the face of the prime hero, a fine handsome supple fellow, who was called in the programme Herr Adalbert Steinfuggen, or some such name. Well, it seemed that he knew me, for as I struggled out after a considerable interval, I heard myself accosted, 'Mr. Dutton! Sir, surely have the honor of speaking to Mr. Dutton of Micklethwayte?' I assure you he was the very pink of politeness. Do you remember, Miss Egremont, Abel Stone?"

"Oh, Abel Stone! He was a choir boy at Micklethwayte, I remember! He was very handsome, and had a splendid voice; but he was a real monkey for mischief; and nobody could manage him but mother. She was always pleading that he should not be turned out, and at last he ran away.'

"Yes; he went off with a circus, and there he found his vocation, rose and throve, married the prima donna, and is part owner. He seems very respectable, and was so friendly and affectionate that I ventured to consult him; when on hearing whom I was seeking, he became warmly interested, and gave me just the information I wanted. He said he had little doubt that Funny Frank was a clown called Brag, with whom he had had words some years back for misusing the children. He said he did not hold with harshness to the little ones in teaching them to do the feats, which certainly were wonderful. If they were frightened, they were nervous and met with accidents; but make much of them, and they thought it all fun, and took a pleasure in their performances. However this Brag, though a clever fellow, could not be hindered from bullying, and at last he went off with a girl of the troupe and set up on their own account. Stone, or whatever he pleases to call himself, had met them several times, but he spoke of them with great contempt as "low," and they did not frequent the same places as he does. However, he referred to one of his men, and found that they had been at Epsom on the Derby day, and moreover, that there was a report of them having lately narrowly escaped being in a scrape about a child who had been injured. There was no scruple as to advising me where to look for them, or as to the best means of detection. Stone was very indignant, and made me understand that all his young people were either to the manner born, or willingly hired out by their parents. I saw them in private life, and they looked happy and well fed, but that was no guarantee for Funny Frank. Well, I followed him up without success, trying each place Stone had set down for me, till I came last night to Lyndhurst, a very pretty place in the New Forest, where there is to be a fair to-morrow, beginning this afternoon. Stone advised me to look about before the affair opened, while unpacking and arranging was going on. Well, after all, it was very simple. I strolled out with my dog round the field where the vans and booths were getting into order. There was what I thought a little girl in a faded red petticoat sitting on the steps at the bottom of a yellow van with her head on her hands."

"That was me," said Alwyn, lighting up. "And Mothu came and kissed Fan!"

"Who, my darling?"

"She, mother dear."

"Here's her picture, dear boy."

"Not only the picture - she came out of it when I cried, up on the nasty-smelling bundle in the van all in the dark."

"She came?"

"Yes, she came, and made it so nice, and hushed me. I wasn't afraid to go to by-by when she came. And she sang. Sister, can't you sing like that?"

"Not here, I'm afraid, dear, dear boy," she whispered, holding him so tight that he gave a little cry of "It hurts." Then came the prayers, not a word forgotten, and the little voice joined in her murmured thanksgiving for bringing him home.

She was much moved and awe-stricken at these words of her little brother; but she had to dress in haste for dinner, listening the while to her maids rejoinings and vituperatious of the wretches who had maltreated the child.

When she came down she found no one in the drawing-room but Mr. Dutton, whom her father had asked to the happiest meal that had perhaps ever been eaten in that house.

She went towards him with winged steps in her white dress: "Oh! Mr. Dutton, we have not said half enough to you, but we never, never can."

He gave a curious, trembling half smile, as she held out her hand to him, and said: "The joy is great in itself," speaking in a very low voice.

"Oh! I am so glad that you did it,' cried Ursula, "It would not have been half so sweet to owe it to anyone else."

"Miss Egremont, do you know what you are saying?" he exclaimed.

"Don't call me Miss Egremont! You never used to. Why should you?"

"I have not dared ——" he began.

"Dared! Don't you know you always were our own Mr. Dtton——best, wisest friend of all, and now more than ever."

"Stay," he said, "I cannot allow you in your fervour to say such things to me, unaware of the strength of feeling you are stirring within me."

"You! you! Mr. Dutton!" cried Nuttie, with a moment's recoil. "You don't mean that you care for me."

"I know it is preposterous——" he began.

"Preposterous! Yes, that you should care one bit for silly, foolish, naughty, self-willed me. Oh, Mr. Dutton, you can't mean it!"

"Indeed, I would have kept silence and not disturbed you with my presumption, if——"

"Hush!" she cried. "Why, it makes me so glad and so proud, I don't know what to do. I didn't think anybody was good enough for you—unless, it was dear, dear mother—and that it should be me."

"It is true," he said gravely, "my younger days were spent in a vain dream of that angel, then when all was ended, I thought such were not for me; but the old feeling has wakened, it seems to me in greater force than ever, though I meant to have kept it under control——"

"Oh, I am glad you didn't It seems as if the world swam round with happiness," and she held his hand as if to steady herself, starting however as Annaple opened the door saying, "We've been sending telegrams with the good news."

Then an arch light came into her bright eyes, but the others were behind her, and she said no more.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—Found and Taken

"The angels of the gateway
Bent softly to the child,
And stretched glad hands t take him
To the kingdom undefiled."—B. M.

"Come up and see him," said Nuttie, as touch me! Fan's not here!"

To tell him she was Cousin Annaple, Billy's mamma, had no effect; he did not seem able to understand, and she could only retire—nurse being thus convinced that to let him see another stranger to-night would only do further harm. Nuttie and nurse succeeded in reassuring him that he was safe at home and with them, and in hushing him off into what they hoped would be a quiet wholesome sleep in spite of the hot sultry night, on which Annaple laid a good deal of the blame of his restlessness and feverishness.

Nuttie only came down for a short time before the visitors went away; and then she wrote a note to Dr. Brownlow, which Mark promised to leave as he went to the city in the morning, Mr. Egremont, in his present relief, pooh poohing all fears, and backing up Annaple's belief in the powers of "tired nature's soft restorer"; but Mr. Dutton looked grave and said that he had remarked the extreme tenderness, but had hoped that much was due to his own inexperience in handling little children. The parting clasp of the hand had a world of meaning in it, and Nuttie openly said that she hoped to tell him after matins at St. Michael's how the boy was. But she could not be there. When she went upstairs at night the half-delirious terrors had returned, and there was another difficult soothing and comforting before the child slept again. Nurse fancied the unwonted presence might disturb him, and insisted on her going to her own room.

Easily Discouraged.

"Yes," said a base ball man, "I'm discouraged, and have given up the business forever. Why, the very first game they got onto me in the second inning, and pounded me all over the field."

"That ought not to discourage you. Many a pitcher has had similar luck."

"Yes, but I wasn't the pitcher; I was the umpire."

Red, white, and blue is the favorite color combination for lawn tennis suits.

Madame Patti, according to her own statement, received $10,500 as her share of the receipts of her first concert in Buenos Ayres in April last. The services of Theodore Thomas and his orchestra of sixty musicians can be secured for a single concert for $3,000. Yet there is more educational value in one concert given by Thomas's orchestra than in a score of concerts at which Patti is the star, and as is generally the case at her concerts, the only competent artist. The comparison is an instructive commentary on the state of musical culture of the present day.

HOUSEHOLD.

Family Mending.

DARNING, PATCHING, REPAIRING AND MAKING OVER.

The mother of a family appreciates the full force of the homely proverb, "A stitch in time saves nine." Many times nine are saved by prompt attention to repairs, and the greatest help to making is mending. Family mending consists of darning, patching, repairing and making over.

To darn well, select the number of thread or silk best suited to the material, and use the finest needle that will carry it. The edges of splits and tears must first be caught lightly together with long basting stitches that can easily be cut and drawn out when the darning is done. This prevents one edge stretching more than the other. Run the needle from the darner in very small stitches in and out its whole length before drawing through; then towards the darner in the same way, and so on, backwards and forwards till the length of the tear is covered. Tears are apt to be three cornered. Begin such in the center to make the point fit even, and darn towards each end. All darning of this character is done in the same way, but the finer the material the finer must be the needle and cotton.

In darning much worn material, baste under the split a piece of the same goods and darn the two together. In all cases it strengthens to darn upon another piece but does not make so smooth a darn. A ragged tear must have always a piece put under it. Ravellings of the same are best for darning flannels or dress goods, and if the mend is dampened and pressed with a hot iron it is almost unnoticeable. Tears in cloth darned upon the wrong side, the stitches run upon the surface, not going through, scarcely show upon the right side. In lined articles the darning must, of course, be done upon the right side.

All tears must be darned before washing. If the edges are once stiffened by wetting and drying they can never be mended neatly.

To darn a hole in a stocking begin with as long, a strand of cotton as can be easily managed, and a long, slim needle. Pass the needle back and forth across one way, letting each long stitch lie close to the one next it, and running the needle a little beyond the edge of the hole for greater strength, being careful not to draw the cotton tight enough to pucker. When the hole is covered, cross the other way, taking on the needle every other stitch of those in the first crossing. When finished you have a neat, strong basket work; neither a wide checker work than can be seen through, nor a thick, uneven surface that hurts the foot. After mending the holes the thin places in stockings should be run thickly, backwards and forwards with needle and cotton to prevent breaking. In darning toes and heels it is helpful to darn upon a china egg, but in other parts of the stocking a flatter darn is made by using only the hand. To darn woolen stockings wool must be used. For cotton stockings a French darning cotton, that comes in small, soft balls, is superior to that bought upon cards. It runs through several numbers, is fine and smooth, and keeps its color well.

Holes in garments or house-linen must be patched. To patch, baste a square of the same material under the hole, cut the edges of the hole even, turn under, and hem in small stitches neatly down to the patch. Then turn the edges of the patch and hem down upon the garment. This finishes both sides neatly. If the garment patched is figured or striped, the figures and stripes

Meantime make a white sauce by stirring together over the fire one ounce of butter and one ounce of flour until they are smooth, then adding a pint and a half of the broth gradually; season with a little more salt and pepper and a quarter of saltspoonful of grated nutmeg; when the sauce has boiled up well stir into it with an egg; whip the yolks of two raw eggs, put in the meat and cook for five minutes, stirring occasionally.

THE MISERIES OF MISERS.

Some Remarkable Men Who Regarded Wealth Above all Physical Comforts.

Perhaps the most famous miser that ever lived was John Elwes, an Englishmar, who died from neglect because he refused to incur the expense of physicians and nurses, though worth not less than $4,000,000. In the case of John Elwes, his sordid character was not the result of ignorance for he was a graduate of a Swiss university and later in life was a member of Parliament. His greed of gold was an hereditary sin. He was a son of a London brewer, who died when the boy was only four years old. His mother survived, but to such an extent did her passion for money gain a hold upon her that, though she had $500,000 in her own right, she actually starved to death. An uncle, Sir Marvey Elwes, was also a miser, and the example of these two blood relatives exercised such an influence upon John Elwes that he became the most famous miser of three centuries. After his return to England from Geneva Elwes moved in fashionable London society, where his prospective wealth entitled him to recognition.

When he visited his uncle in Suffolk, where the latter lived in most abject penury, his hopeful nephew would play a double part. He would wear his fashionable garments as far as a little inn in Chelmsford, where he exchanged them for a pair of patched trousers, a worn out coat, darned stockings, and clodhopper shoes with iron buckles. In this attire he would call upon his uncle. The latter would not permit a fire on cold March days on the score of its being extravagant, and the two would sit with a crust of bread and one glass of wine between them until it was too dark to see each other's faces, and then they would retire to save the expense of candles. When this uncle died he left his nephew a fortune of $1,000,000.

As he grew older John Elwes developed the terrible avarice that marked his life by a passion for cards. He would sit in his threadbare clothes with the Duke of Northumberland and play with feverish eye and trembling hand with thousands at stake, and then after having lost or won as the case might be, he would walk to his miserable lodgings, three miles distant, in a peltering rain rather than pay for a cab.

Elwes owned a magnificent country seat in Berkshire. When he would leave London to visit it he would put three hard boiled eggs in his pockets, then mounting a horse would ride over fields and through lanes, going miles out of his way to avoid roads where he would have to pay a few pennies toll. A more than faithful biographer says of him:

"He would eat his provisions in the last stage of putrefaction rather than have a fresh joint from the butcher, and at one time he wore a wig about a fortnight which he picked out of a rut in a lane, and which had apparently been thrown away by a beggar."

At his country seat he allowed of no repair save little brown paper and a bit of broken glass. During the harvest he would amuse himself with going into the fields to glean the corn on the ground of his own tenants, and they used to leave a little more than common to please the old gentleman, who was as eager after it as any pauper in the parish. To save bed coverings, before his death, he would go to sleep completely dressed with boots and hat on. He died miserable, his mind weakened by worry and privation. The value of his fortune, which went to two sons, was not less than $4,000,000.

Another celebrated miser was Ephraim Lapes Pereira, Baron d' Aguilar, formerly cashier of the Empress Maria Theresa, of Austria. Strange to say, the early years of small stitches neatly down to the patch. Then turn the edges of the patch and hem down upon the garment. This finishes both sides neatly. If the garment patched is figured or striped, the figures and stripes must be made to match in putting in the patch. Cloth is too heavy usually to turn the edges in patching. The edges of the patch must be run in small stitches upon the wrong side and the edge of the hole darned down closely on the right side.

The Boys.

Don't make the mistake of thinking that "anything will do for the boys!" Upon what is done for your boys depends their life-long habits and career. With a small, dark room, dull carpet, hard bed and all the old furniture, what boy can be taught the pleasures of owning nice things, and the importance of keeping them in order? Give the boys equal advantage with your girls. Coax them to stay at home with good books and periodicals, pictures, ornaments and comforts in their sleeping rooms, have their "chums" come to dinner frequently, invite their girl friends often, and treat them with great politeness at all times. A wise mother, well known to us, puts little lunches for her boys in their room when they have been out spending an evening and come home late. Not long since one of them said to her, "I don't believe anybody else will ever do that for me, and I doubt very much if I ever have another home that will be as pleasant as this has been."

Oh, it pays to treat the boys well!

Non-Breakable Lamp Chimneys.

Some person has studied out this way to prepare lamp chimneys so that they will not break: With a diamond cut the bulging part of the chimney with perpendicular lines at short distances apart. These cuts are said to give the glass the necessary room for expansion and contraction when quickly heated or cooled. If a diamond is not available, put the chimney in a pail, for protection, and immerse it in the reservoir of water on your cook-stove when the water is cool in the morning and let it remain all day while the water is hot and all night when it will slowly cool. This is a kind of annealing process that is said to toughen the glass. The use of soapsuds is to be avoided in cleaning, and only clear hot water used.

Cooking Recipes.

SOUP BALLS.—Boil five eggs until hard; remove the shells and pound the yolks until powdered. Add the whites of two uncooked eggs, with a little flour and salt. Mix into balls, boil and drop into the soup.

STEWED POTATOES.—Peel and cut into small pieces. To one pint of potatoes add one-half pint of milk, butter size of an egg, salt and pepper. Stew twenty minutes. Thicken with a tablespoonful of flour stewed in a cup of milk.

BEEF PIE.—Line a dish with a rich crust. Put in a layer of cold beef cut up fine, then one of onions; one of potatoes, then another layer of meat. Season with pepper and salt. Dredge with a little flour. Put on water enough to make a gravy, then a top crust. Bake one hour.

COOKIES.—One cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, two eggs, one-half cup of sweet milk, one teaspoon of baking powder, three cups of flour; roll thin, cut in shape and bake in a quick oven.

SEED COOKIES.—One cup of butter, three cups of sugar, two eggs, one cup of cream, eight cups of flour, two and one-half teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one teaspoon boils. Add the beaten yolk of one egg just as you take from the fire. Serve immediately.

CHICKEN RISSOLES.—Take cold baked chicken left from dinner; free the meat from the bones and chop fine. Rub a little dried bread into fine crumbs, and to this add any heated liquor of chicken, or hot water, and moisten the bread thoroughly. To a pint bowl full of crumbs and meat allow one teaspoonful of salt, one of pepper, one of sifted sage and one heaping teaspoonful of butter. Make into little cakes, dust with flour and fry to a light brown.

COOKIES.—One cup butter, two cups sugar, four eggs, four cups flour, three tablespoonfuls milk, three teaspoonfuls baking powder. Rub the flour and butter thoroughly together, cream the butter and sugar, beat the egg separately, add to the whole nutmeg, cinnamon or any flavoring preferred. Sift in the flour and baking powder and make it stiff enough to roll out and cut in any shape desired.

PORK CAKE.—One pound of fat salt pork chopped fine, one and one-half cups of boiling water poured over the pork, two pounds of raisins, currants and citron, two cups of sugar, eight cups of flour, one tablespoonful soda, and cloves and cinnamon to taste.

Hungry for Love.

Delays are always dangerous, but never so irredeemably as in the case of loving words or deeds. It always proves impossible to speak to-morrow exactly the cordial or affectionate word which to-day demanded of us.

A mother whose child had died suddenly was so entirely prostrated with grief that some of the too officious friends asked her to consider if her sufferings were greater than that of others who had lost friends.

"Oh, it is not the same, it is not the same!" she cried. "My little girl was different from other children; she was so loving! She used to come to me and beg me to kiss her, or take her in my lap for a minute, and sometimes I was busy and told her to run away and play.

"I hurt her little heart. I made it shut up its little leaves when it ought to have been coaxed open by the sunshine. I shall never forgive myself."

She never did forgive herself, and though she was almost pathetically loving to the children who were left, no lapse of time could ever erase from her mind the memory of that little girl who was hungry for love.

A Warning to Brutal Parents.

An immense impetus will be given to the Rev. B. Waugh's and other efforts for the protection of children from cruel parents by the sentence passed at Liverpool recently. The ill-treatment of a little girl by her father and stepmother was exceptionally bad. The father was a compositor, and his wife said that he was not responsible. The child was confined in a cellar, the air being excluded. It had little or no food, it was brutally flogged and kicked, and a red hot poker applied to it. The judge sentenced the man to seven years' penal servitude and the woman to the same punishment for life. It is an awful sentence. Our only fear is that its very severity may evoke undue sympathy for cruel parents. On the other hand, we may undoubtedly hope that it will deter many a brute from putting his little ones to a slow death.

Nicely Put.

"Now, Mr. Bjones," said Mrs. Ringfinger, who was visiting Mrs. Bjones, "don't try to be polite. Do just as you would if we were not here, and we shall feel ever so much more at home."

$4,000,000.

Another celebrated miser was Ephraim Lapes Pereira, Baron d' Aguilar, formerly cashier of the Empress Maria Theresa, of Austria. Strange to say, the early years of his life at the Austrian court were years of splendor. Then he moved to England, married a wealthy lady and settled down. He lived in sumptuous style; kept several carriages and twenty servants. He was married twice, and after his second marriage he left his family and friends and withdrew himself from the fashionable world. He turned farmer. At this time he was worth $1,000,000. After a year in the country his place began to be known as "Starvation Farmyard." His cattle and poultry were a mass of skin and bones, and peasants began to hoot at the baron whenever he appeared for his mean treatment of his animals. He always insisted on being present when the stock was being fed, so that he might see that there was nothing stolen or wasted. He went about his farm clad in mean and dirty clothes, and refused to spend money to buy new ones. After a life of selfishness and meanness he died in March, 1802, leaving property estimated at $1,100,000. His diamonds alone were worth $150,000, while his solid silver plate weighed over 700 pounds.

But exceeding by far the example of John Elwes is that of Daniel Dancer, whose life is the most striking example perhaps in all history of the insatiable thirst for gold.

His father died and left him, together with a sister, a comfortable fortune. Dancer and his sister lived in a miserable hut near Harrow, in Middlesex, England. Their fae consisted of a piece of cheap beef and fourteen hard dumplings boiled on Sunday, and this lasted them the rest of the week.

The pair dressed in rags, and when the sister was dying from cold and starvation her brother refused to summon medical aid on the ground that he could not spend his money for medicine, because if the "old girl" was going to die the doctors couldn't save her anyhow. Dancer was too miserly to provide soap and towels for himself.

He would wash in a neighboring pool and lie out in the sun till he was dried. His clothes, a mass of patches, were held up by a belt of twisted hay, and his whole appearance was that of abject misery. Duncan on his rambles never returned empty handed. He would gather up the bones in the village streets and lanes, bring them home, and after picking them clean himself would crack them and feed them to the dog. Once neighbors complained that his dog worried and killed their sheep, and for fear that he would have to pay for future depredations, he took the dog to a blacksmith's where he had all the poor dog's teeth broken off to prevent a further recurrence of the trouble. He mended his own shoes and wore one hat continuously for thirteen years.

When he lay on his dying bed his only garment was an old sack. When remonstrated with he said that he came into the world without a shirt and he would go out of it that way. When a visitor suggested that he have a pillow for his head he ordered his only servant, whose weekly wages was thirty cents, to bring him a wisp of hay, which he used as a pillow till his death, a few days later. He left an estate valued at $25,000 amply sufficient for a his needs during his life-time, had he so desired. This money, in odd sums, was hidden in old rags, nailed down to the under part of the manger floor in his miserable cow shed, and over $10,000 was found hidden in the manure pile, where it had lain for years.

The Napanee Express.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, JUNE 29, 1888.

—The plans and specifications of the proposed extension of the Napanee, Tamworth & Q. R. from Tamworth to Tweed have been filed at Ottawa. Upon the township of Hungerford voting a bonus of $15,000 the work will be pushed rapidly forward to completion. The matter is now being "worked up" in Hungerford and it is likely that a few days will determine the action of the township in the premises.

—It is announced that the Hon. Mr. Laurier will make a tour of Ontario this summer and address the people on the questions of the day. As leader of the Opposition in the House during the past session he has won much favor with the people and no doubt will receive a hearty reception whereever he speaks. We would suggest that the Reformers of Lennox secure him for one day. The French leader on the government side, Sir Hector Langevin, has been heard; now let us hear his opponent.

—For some reason or other a rumor has been set afloat in Ernesttown to the effect that the credit for baulking the Colebrook bridge scheme was due to the new members at the council board this year. This, anyone reading the report in THE EXPRESS of last week, can see is not the case. Reeve Parks, of North Fredericksburgh, is entitled to the credit. He first ferretted the matter up. This Messrs Reid and Baker, of Camden, corroborated at the late session. Having found that the bridge was not county property, Mr. Parks showed it to other members, Messrs Bowen Aylsworth and E.S. Lapum in particular. The fight really commenced at the December session before the new members were honored with seats at the council board.

—Considerable amendments have been made in the summary convictions act, which come into force at once. Perhaps the most important is that regarding witnesses refusing to answer summonses. By so doing they now make themselves liable to arrest without the warrant being "backed" and liable for all costs of summons, warrant and detention in custody. The Scott Act has also been amended. The clauses regarding druggists selling liquor and doctors' furnish certificates are made more stringent and the decision of police magistrates in the case of the latter can be appealed against

FROM THE CAPITAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

OTTAWA, June 26th.—The Postmaster-General has been asked to reduce the rate of postage from three to two cents, but has declined: First because the change would seriously impair the postal revenue, and secondly while there is a two cent rate in the United States we have a lower rate for drop letters and a parcel post which is unknown in the U.S. Canada uses almost 58,000,000 of three cent stamps. If therefore, the two cent rate was adopted the revenue would have suffered $575,000, provided the lower rate did not multiply the number of letters, which, however, was the experience of the States. Canada should at least raise the limit of weight to an ounce as there is more annoyance over the uncertainity whether your letter is overweight than there is over the cost of the stamp. The American limit is an ounce. The P.O. revenue is about $2,500,000 a year.

LORD STANLEY'S CARRIAGE.

The Governor General has brought a carriage with him which is a great curiosity to the natives. The bottom of the carriage rests on leather straps which are suspended from four high springs attached to the axles. The seat for the coachman in front is up about five feet, but the seat for the footman away up behind is even higher in the air. The trappings of the carriage are gorgeous. The massive wheels have silver plated caps for the hubs and the boxes are emblazoned with the coat of arms of the ancient house of Stanley's.

THE OLDEST SERVANT.

The oldest civil servant in the Dominion is Mr W.H. Griffin, the deputy Postmaster General, who has served Canada for 57 years, and is 76 years of age. He began in 1831 as a clerk and was steadily promoted. His successor will probably be Lieut-Col. White, the present Secretary of the Post Office Department, who is thoroughly up to the work. Mr W. D. Le Saueur, the the young literateur who is now Supt of the Savings Bank Branch, will likely take Col White's position.

A DISTINGUISHED VISITOR.

Prince Roland Napoleon Bonaparte, whose grandfather was a brother of the great Napoleon, was here a few days ago and was entertained by Hon Messrs Chapleau and Caron.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

The Government statistics of the railways of Canada have been prepared up to 31 Dec., 1887. Thirteen new lines are in existence and several of the older lines have added to the mileage under traffic. Iron rails are fast being replaced by steel. The increase in traffic over 1886 is represented by $5,000,000. Of track laid there are 12,332 miles, of which 11,691 are in operation. The earnings were $38,842,010, working expenses, $27,624,683 so that the net earnings were over eleven millions. Out of 10,698,638 passengers carried only 10 were killed and 49 injured. Up to date the Federal Government have aided railways to the extent of $129,000,000. The Ontario government have given $6,000,000 and Quebec over $7,000,000, New Brunswick $4,000,000, Nova Scotia $1,653,000, Manitoba $1,895,000. The municipalities gave over $12,000,000. Counting other sources the capital given by the people of Canada to railways amounts to the enormous sum of $63,000,000 or $55,447 for every mile. This record will compare with any other in existence.

An Extraordinary Offer to Wanting Employment.

We want live, energetic, agents in every county in the United States and Canada to sell a patent article of great merit, ON ITS MERITS. An article having a large sale paying over 100 per cent. profit, having no competition, and on which the agent is protected in the exclusive sale by a deed given for each and every county he may secure for us. With all these advantages to our agents, and the fact that it is an article that can be sold to every houseowner, it might not be necessary to make "AN EXTRAORDINARY OFFER" to secure good agents at once, but we have concluded to make it to show, not only our confidence in the merits of our invention, but in its salability by any agent that will handle it with energy. Our agents now at work are making from $150 to $300 a month clear, and this fact makes it safe for us to make our offer to all who are out of employment. Any agent that will give our business a thirty days' trial and fail to clear at least $100 in this time, ABOVE ALL EXPENSES, can return all goods unsold to us and we will refund the money paid for them. No such employer of agents ever dared to make such offers, nor would we if we did not know that we have agents now making more than double this amount. Our large descriptive circulars explain our offer fully, and these we wish to send to everyone out of employment who will send us three one cent stamps for postage. Send at once and secure the agency in time for the boom, and go to work on the terms named in our extraordinary offer.

certificates are made more stringent and the decision of police magistrates in the case of the latter can be appealed against The magistrates hitherto have had no power to issue search warrants for liquor until it was actually brought out in evidence that liquor was secreted in the premises and then if 500 gallons were found only 20 could be destroyed or confiscated. Now any one suspecting that liquor is on certain premises can so state before a police magistrate, who will issue a warrant, and upon any liquor, no matter what quantity, being found, it, and the articles in which it is stored, can be confiscated, providing of course that it is clearly shown that the liquor was for illegal purposes.

—Work they say has its reward. Such has proven the case with Capt A. F. Holmes, of this place. Our doughty friend has done more for the tories of Lennox than any other; his work has not been confined to this section either for he has assisted outside. That he would some day be rewarded was expected; therefore Wednesday morning when word reached Napanee that he had received a government appointment the townspeople were not greatly surprised. That he should receive one so agreeable to himself and for which he is so well qualified was cause for rejoicing. The captain has been appointed inspector of fisheries for northern waters. He will have command of the steam yacht Cruiser, which the government lately purchased from Allan Gilmour. The boat is a fine one, fitted up, it is said, at a cost of $20,000. It will ply chiefly on the Georgian bay. Friend Holmes is a Tory out and out; still there is no reason why we should not congratulate him, which we most cheerfully do. He possesses just the qualities to fill such a position.

MANITOBA'S SON.

On the 1st July, the twenty-first anniversary of Confederation, Senator Schultz will take office as Lieut-Governor of Manitoba in whose affairs he has all his lifetime been deeply interested. He was born in 1840, at Amherstburg, in the county of Essex, and graduated in medicine at the Kingston college in 1871. He has been in Parliament since 1871, when Manitoba was made a Province, and is married to a lady who was his devoted nurse all through his recent illness, an illness so severe as to leave him only the wreck of what he once was physically. Dr Schultz was once a very handsome man and is still of impressive presence. He endured many dangers and hardships during the first Northwest rebellion, when he was leader of the Canadian forces. During the last two sessions he has been the means of bringing to the knowledge of Parliament the resources of the McKenzie district.

THE CABINET.

The report that Mr Weldon, M. P. for Albert, N.B, is to be taken into the cabinet in place of Mr Costigan, is credited here as a very likely event. The change would give the Premier an able colleague in place of an incapable one. Mr Weldon is inexperienced but he is a promising member of the House. The purchase of a house by Mr Dewdney in Ottawa, confirms the report that he will become Minister of the interior Mr McLelan will leave the Postmaster-Generalship for the gubernatorial residence of Nova Scotia early in July. Hon C. H. Tupper will reach here this week to assume his new office as Minister of Marine. The Premier arrived in Toronto this morning where he went to reconcile his followers to Mr Dewdney's appointment. According to Judge McGuire, of the Northwest, Mr Dewdney is an eminently proper representative. He will, it is believed, seek a constituency in British Columbia.

ANOTHER LIEUT-GOVERNOR.

Hon Joseph Royal, a French Canadian lawyer, will be sworn in as Lieut-Governor of the Northwest Territories, on Dominion Day. He was associated with Hon J. A. Chapleau, in the defence of Lepine and Naud charged with the death of Thomas Scott. He wrote for the press until 1871 when he went to Manitoba and was styled the leader of the French of that Province. He was a member of the first Ministry in Manitoba. He was returned for Provencher in 1879 to the House of Commons and now vacates the seat by accepting an office under the Crown. He is Vice Chancellor of the University of Manitoba, and made his way mainly by the influence of Archbishop Tache, whose protege he was. He is 51 years old.

CAPITAL CHAT.

There are now five seats vacant in the Commons:—Cardwell, Nicolet, Provencher, Cumberland and Colchester. They all returned Conservatives at the general election.

Mr Hayter Reed has been appointed Indian Commissioner in place of Mr Dewdney.

General Middleton will inspect the Royal Military college at Kingston before it closes on the 29th. Sir John Macdonald has promised to present the prizes if possible.

PRESENTATIONS

To Rev. W. H. Emsley Before Leaving Napanee.

Monday evening, June 18th, Rev. Mr. Emsley met his class in the Eastern Methodist church, the service throughout being more interesting and impressive than usual through his connection with them being about at an end. At perhaps a later hour than at other times the service closed, Mr. Emsley retiring to the parsonage, little suspecting that later on he was to again meet the friends. Just as Mr. Emsley's family were thinking of retiring for the night the door-bell rang, and at once the class entered. Order being restored, the following address was read, and a handsome easy chair presented to the retiring clergyman:

TO REV. W. H. EMSLEY,

Dear Pastor and Leader,—The members of your Monday night class assure you that they realize with difficulty that your relation to them, which has existed so harmoniously, has been severed by the operation of church laws and the action of church authorities. But though you have been removed to another field of labor, within the bounds of another conference, imaginary lines cannot interfere with the liberty of esteem, the freedom of love or the influence of remembered joys. Whilst we have with others enjoyed the benefits of the word preached, it has been our special privilege to be associated with you in class relationship, for which we devoutly thank God. Under the influence of your anxiety in our behalf we have been aided to a fuller realization of God, as our loving Father, and of His Son Jesus Christ, as our loving personal Saviour, to whom we may at all times come with the utmost trust and confidence. We gratefully acknowledge that we have been so strengthened by your constant presentation of the love and goodness of God as to become partakers of your conviction that he not only provides for each the best of the life which now is, but that He will also in the life which is to come furnish the means whereby we may rise to the full perfection of our divinely bestowed powers.

As a pledge that we will walk in the way of the Lord until called to sit down with the King in His glory, as well as a visible token of our gratitude, we present for your kind acceptance this easy chair, indulging the hope that, as in physical weariness you betake yourself to its comfort and find rest, your spirit may in the hour of exhaustion or perplexity rest on the sure word of prophesy and find consolation and refreshment there. We hope and pray that the God of all grace may continue to use your eminent abilities for the advancement of His Kingdom and that he will abundantly bless you and Mrs. Emsley in your new field of labor, and long preserve your lives and conserve your happiness.

Signed on behalf of the Monday night class Napanee (East) Methodist church.

J. R. DAFOE,
F. W. VANDUSEN.

Napanee, June 18, 1883.

Never was man more surprised than Mr. Emsley. With tears in his eyes he replied as only he can. At first it was with difficulty that the rev. gentleman could speak at all, so visibly affected were the donors as well as the honored. In a little he, however, collected himself and replied very affectionately, thanking the friends for the present, and expressing sorrow at the parting about to take place Not only as pastor had his sojourn in Napanee been pleasant but as a class-leader he had received an inspiration from them to better fight the battles of life and live for the Master. In his counsels he had always striven to give them words that would make them better men and women and had enforced his teaching with prayers. He closed by again thanking them and trusting that the class would look steadfastly at Him in whom was all fullness.

The chair is an exceedingly fine one—walnut, finished in silk plush. The main covering is of mauve color, while across the front of the chair is a band of beautiful blue plush; the head rest is also blue.

Thursday morning, a little before Mr Emsley left for Brockville, he was again most agreeably surprised by being furnishing them with copies of THE EXPRESS. They were welcome "visitors" at the camp; like letters from home.

The boys received letters from home saying that the Napanee people heard that some of No 6 company had received sunstrokes. There is no truth in the report. There has been no sickness in our company whatever and only four men in the whole 47th battalion.

On Monday the 47th went to the butts and did some good shooting. Following is the score made by No 6 company:

ROYAL

Mrs John Juniac has gone on a trip to Toronto and Oswego, N.Y.

Benjamin, West & Co. are introducing new machinery into their wheel factory here.

Work has commenced on the new roller mill here, and will be prosecuted with vigor.

Rev Smith, Presbyterian minister, of Centreville, ably filled the pulpit in C. M. church here on Sunday night.

The base ball match on Saturday, between Enterprise and Yarker, resulted in victory for the Yarker boys—14 to 10

The crops in this vicinity are looking fairly well. A big change will be noted in a few days owing to the fine rain on Saturday night.

Gull Creek.

Mr John A. Lott is laid up at present, supposed to be by a slight sun-stroke while working out in the field.

Things were appearing to suffer for the want of rain, but the rain came on Sunday afternoon and revived the sufferers much.

The water is drying up very fast. Cross Lake reservoir has been exhausted it is said, but the dam is still kept up on the Clare River.

Mr Loyst's mare came in contact with an old wire fence recently and greatly injured herself. Wire fences are dangerous where animals are running at large.

The berry season has commenced. Strawberries are the go at present, many creeping over the ground after the little dainties. Some say that they are not very plentiful; and their season will soon be over.

Huckleberries will be here soon. Many were predicting last week that these would be a failure on account of the intense heat. Probably the recent rain may have helped them.

Centreville.

Miss Shorey, of Maitland, spent a few days at Mr. M. C. Shorey's.

Mr. Peter Hinch has, so we are informed, bought out the business of Mr. Loucks.

Mr. James Tuttle, of Bridgewater, has been visiting friends in this vicinity lately.

Miss Dunbar, teacher of Reid's school, was the guest of Wesley Wagar Saturday and Sunday.

Some Centreville people attended the lawn social at J. D. Wagar's, Enterprise, on Wednesday, 27th.

M. C. Shorey was through part of Prince Edward county last week visiting friends. He reports it very dry in that section.

Mr. and Miss Cathey and Mr. Kent attended the "send off" given the Rev. Jas. Curts at Newburgh, on Wednesday evening of last week.

A meeting of the directors of Camden Agricultural Society met at Kennedy's hotel, on Saturday, 23rd. It was decided to hold the annual show on Saturday, October 13th.

The ladies of Centreville propose holding an entertainment on the evening of Saturday, October 13th. Proceeds for church purposes in connection with the Methodist church.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis Catarrh, asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 149 Block Rochester N.Y.

Thursday morning, a little before Mr Emsley left for Brockville, he was again most agreeably surprised, by being presented with a complete set of Encyclopedia Brittanica, bound in sheep. The presentation was made by a number of the reverend gentleman's friends in and outside the church. The usual address was in this instance omitted, the presentation made in a quiet manner.

FROM THE CAMP.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Gananoque girls have caught the "scarlet" fever.

Excursions arrive here every day, and the parade grounds are crowded with strangers.

The boys have taken a number of trips down among the Islands, Boats are running all the time.

We have had a great deal of rain, supposed to be caused by the firing of the cannon and rifles.

Major General Middleton and the Minister of Militia after reviewing the troops left Wednesday morning.

The Kingston News says: "Lieut Smith is to be complimented on having the neatest company in camp."

Mr Geo Napier took a canoe down with him, and enjoyed many a pleasant hour on the St. Lawrence.

The soldiers appreciate the efforts of the Y. M. C. A. All sorts of amusements are furnished by them free of charge.

Baseball is the general sport of the evening and it is not an unusual sight to see twenty different nines playing at once.

The 47th batt band played for a garden party on Wednesday night. They are without doubt the best on the ground.

The battalion was inspected by Col Van Straubenzie on Wednesday. He was well pleased with the appearance of the men.

At the Battalion drill on Monday afternoon the colonel complimented No 6 company upon their fine appearance and drill.

Messrs W. S Henry and H. Jamieson visited the camp on Monday and enjoyed the hospitality of "the boys" in the evening.

The Napanee band played for the excursion to General Middleton and Sir Adolphe Caron, Minister of Militia, on Monday evening.

A few days ago a soldier from Amherst Island was injured by falling on a tent pin. He was sent to the Kingston General Hospital.

Among the list of infantry officers who did not report was Capt Lennox, of the 49th Batt, who I understand is a resident of your town.

It is the intention of the boys to maintain No 6 company and to always deserve the praise which they have received at the Gananoque camp.

No 6 have formed a mess of their own and live about as well as the officers of the 47 th batt. The Gananoque girls have been very kind to the boys.

Lieut Sharp drilled No. 6 until Capt Helliwell came. The boys think Lieut. Sharp a perfect officer and a courteous gentleman. The boys owe much to him.

A free excursion for the boys is announced for Thursday evening. It is tendered by the staff of the 47th. It will be to Brockville and return up the American channel per str Geneva.

The Napaneeans were pleased to see the following from home, who came down with the excursion on Monday last: Mrs F. W. Smith, Mr and Mrs Jno Stevenson, H Jamieson, W. S. Henry, Jas Miller, and Jas Wilson.

The members of No 6 company and the band boys appreciate your kindness in

YOUNG FOLKS.

THE PRICE OF A DINNER.

BY JOHN R. CORYELL.

One hot, dusty day in early May—it seemed like a midsummer day out of place—a lad with a weary, painfully lagging step toiled up the road that led to the hill-top overlooking the little town of Maple Centre.

Almost hidden under the lofty sugar-maples, with here and there a peaked roof or a gable window peeping out of the cool green, the town looked a paradise to the worn-out boy, who stopped in the hot sunshine, and emitted under his breath a soft "Ah!" of thankfulness.

For a moment a happy smile brightened his dark face, and one seeing him then would have thought him handsome; but the next moment he could as well have been thought ugly, for a sullen scowl chased away the boyish smile, and left a prematurely old and almost vicious expression.

"Won't let me stay there neither, I s'pose!" he muttered. "Well, they can't stop me from going through the town, an' they can't lock me up if I don't beg."

Near the foot of the hill he passed the school-house, and as he heard the hum of voices floating out of the open window, he wondered bitterly what it would be like to lead the comfortable, easy lives of the boys in there.

He was thirsty. A pump stood in the school-yard. He cast a quick glance around, and seeing nobody, stole in at the gate and towards the pump, with a manner at once stealthy and defiant, as if willing to escape detection, but ready to brave the consequences of it.

No one saw him, and he greedily drank down two brimming dipperfuls of the cool water. Then he stole out of the yard again, and limped on toward the centre of the town, until, unable to resist the tempting shade of one of the great maples, he dropped on the grass, and with a sigh stretched his numbed limbs.

The school doors had opened, and it was the buzz of eager young voices that had caused him to sink back, courting such obscurity as the grass and shade afforded. Laughing, shouting, running, throwing stones in the usual boy fashion, the boys came boisterously down the road. Furtively the little wayfarer watched their approach, hoping they would either not see or notice him, but preparing with dogged fierceness for the disappointment of his hopes.

There was a sudden hush as they drew nearer to him, and he knew he had been seen.

"It's a tramp," he heard one of them say; and though he did not stir, the angry blood rushed to his face, and turned the clear olive of his skin to a copper bronze.

When they drew nearer, and could distinguish more clearly, he heard the words, "It's only a boy."

Something in the tone of the voice impelled him to glance quickly around, and he did so just in time to see a stone leave the hand of one of the largest boys and come directly towards him.

To dodge the stone and spring to his feet seemed but one act, and in a second he stood, with scowling alertness, scanning the boys now crowding curiously together, and casting upon the one who had thrown the stone an angry look that in some subtle way seemed to contain an invitation to repeat his act of aggression if he dared.

The latter seemed to feel it so, for he laughed awkwardly, and said, "You'd better get out of here; we keep a jail in this town for tramps."

Some of the boys laughed, but most of

Harry, though his head was already aching and his eyes swelling from the telling blows he had received, had the courage to rush once more at his antagonist. Down he went again before the well-directed blows of the stranger; but this time, before he could recover again, his schoolfellows with one accord made a rush at the fighter and hustled him this way and that, with very little regard for the rules of fair play.

The stranger lad fought the crowd fiercely, making no outcry and saying no word until, having been pushed headlong into the dust of the road, he rose, faced the crowd, and sobbing and hoarse with passion, cried out, "I can whip any two of ye in a fair fight."

There seemed no disposition among the boys to put him to the test, but one small voice from the rear called out, "We'll have you arrested."

"You're afraid of me," he said, paying no heed to the threat. "Of me!" and there was a sort of pathetic self-pity in his taunt. "An' I've walked twenty miles since daylight, an' 'ain't had nothin' t' eat since yesterday morning."

He stood there defiantly for a few seconds as if waiting for another onslaught, and then, as the boys, now ashamed of themselves, did not move, he turned wearily away, more faint than before the excitement of the quarrel had lent him a false strength.

He paid no more attention to them, but accepting their treatment of him as a perfectly natural episode in his miserable young life, he limped sullenly through the town, asking no help and expecting none. On the outskirts of the little town he stopped from sheer exhaustion, and leaning against a fence, watched listlessly the movements of a young horse grazing in the field.

As he stood there a young girl hurried past him. He looked up and caught a backward, scared glance from her. She ran on, and he followed slowly, resenting in an undefined way her fear of him.

"What had she to be afraid of?" he asked himself. Not of him, surely, for he was too weary now to hurt anybody—too weary, indeed, to drag his feet any further.

He dropped weakly under a tree, and crossing his arms on his bent knees, laid his head forward on them, wondering if his strength was going to give out before he could reach a place where he could get something to eat.

"If you will come home with me, I am sure I can get you something to eat,"

He looked up with a start. The little girl whose fear of him he had resented stood near him, looking down at him in a pitying yet partly fearful way.

His scowling scrutiny of her alarmed her, and she retreated a pace or two as she timidly went on:

"I heard you say you were hungry. I am sure mamma will give you something to eat."

"Yes," he said, with an ugly sneer, "so's she can have me arrested, for beggin'. No, you don't; you don't catch me so easy. Go on now, and leave me alone."

"Oh!" exclaimed the little girl, in a shocked tone, "how can you say such things? Mamma wouldn't do that for anything."

"No, of course not," he began, sarcastically. And then even his savage fortitude broke under his hunger and weariness, and with a quick, catching sob he wailed appealingly: "Why can't you leave me alone? What have I done to you?"

The brown head fell once more on the ragged arms, and with wide-open eyes the little girl saw the fierce fighter of a few minutes before crying bitterly.

Tears filled her own eyes, and after a moment of timid hesitation she stole up to the friendless lad and gently laid her little

"The one that pelted me? the one I whipped?"

"Yes," responded Katie, uneasily; and then to change the subject, said, "He—the horse I mean—killed our cow last week."

"Did, eh?"

"Yes, Daisy broke in somehow, and he just kicked her so that she died."

"Did he give you another cow?"

"No; he said Daisy had no business to break the fence."

"Has he ever tried to have the horse broken?"

"Yes indeed; but nobody can. He feels bad about it too, for he says its a splendid horse."

"Yes, it's a nice horse. Do you live in that house there?"

"Yes, the green house there. It's the last house this end of town."

"Katie Morris, you said, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"All right. Is that Squire Blodgett's house?"

"Yes."

"Good by, Katie."

"Good-by."

Dick turned back toward the town, and walked away, leaving Katie to wonder what he meant by his odd, quickly put questions, and by returning to town. In the midst of her wonderment she heard her mother calling her, and ran at once to tell what had happened.

Dick, glancing over his shoulder, saw her return home, whereupon he retraced his steps to the gate of Squire Blodgett's lane, and opening it, walked in with the utmost confidence.

Ten minutes later Squire Blodgett was saying to him, "Break my horse? What nonsense is this? What do you mean, you little jackanapes, by coming here with such a story? Who sent you?"

"I tell you I can break your horse to drive kind an' gentle. 'Tain't no nonsense, an' nobody sent me. 'Twon't hurt you to let me try, will it?"

"It won't hurt me, but it would you. Why, he would kick your brains out in two minutes. But see here," exclaimed the Squire, with sudden sharpness, "aren't you the little tramp that got into a fight with my boy?"

Dick's dark eyes flashed angrily, and a saucy retort rose to his lips, but he who had never controlled his temper for his own sake now subdued it for the sake of those who had been kind to him. With an effort he answered, calmly: "I'm no tramp. Your boy pelted me with stones, and I whipped him; that's all."

"That's all, is it?" cried the Squire, angrily. "You little scoundrel!" He caught Dick by the collar, and lifted his hand to cuff him.

"It was my fault, father." Dick turned quickly, and saw Harry, with both eyes black and blue, hurrying up to save him from the squire's wrath.

"I hit him first," continued Harry.

"Oh, you did, eh?" growled the Squire, loosing his hold of Dick, and looking foolish. "Well, get out of here, and be thankful I don't lock you up."

But Dick was not prepared to go yet. "About the horse, Squire?"

"Why, you little impostor, d'you think I'd take the risk of your neck?"

"It's no risk at all, Squire. I've broken hundreds, if I am only a boy. I was born in a stable, an' spent my life there, an' I know some things 'tain't many does know. Let me try."

"Well," said the Squire, impressed by Dick's earnestness, "I'll let you try; but mind, if you get killed, don't blame me."

"I won't. And about the pay for it?"

"Well, if you really do break the horse,

The latter seemed to feel it so, for he laughed awkwardly, and said, "You'd better get out of here; we keep a jail in this town for tramps."

Some of the boys laughed, but most of them moved uneasily to one side, and stood there as if too curious to be willing to lose the chance of seeing what might take place, and yet disinclined to endorse the action of their school-fellow.

With a sort of contemptuous fierceness the stranger glanced from the head to the feet of the boy, and back again to his head, and then said, tauntingly, "You kin throw stones at a feller behind his back an' you kin talk to his face, but you dassent lay a finger on me."

The girls had come up by this time, and were moving slowly by, waiting for something tohappen at which they should scream and run.

"Leave him alone, Harry!" "Come on, Harry!" "What's the matter?" exclaimed several of the older girls; but Harry found himself unable to gracefully extricate himself from the quarrel, and therefore answered the boy with a sullen nttempt at carelessness:

"I don't want to touch you. Why should I?"

"What did you want to throw the stone for, then?"

Harry might properly have answered that he had done it thoughtlessly, and was sorry for it; but it is not very often a boy's way to substitute moral courage for physical, and as Harry had plenty of the latter sort of courage, he met the taunting logic of the stranger's question by taking a menacing step forward and answering, angrily, "Because I wanted to. What of it?"

The prospect of a fight had a singular effect upon the strange lad. His eye lost its hunted, sullen look, and became brightly alert, his feet shifted position a little, and his hands clinched, though they hung carelessly by his side. His manner lost its excitement, and became quitely, almost pleasently expectant. He answered Harry with an exasperating sneer. "Talk's cheap. Why don't you do it again if you dare?"

Harry could feel that his school-mates were wondering if he were afraid of the boy so much smaller than himself, and in a gust of arger he stopped, picked up a small stone, and threw it at his antagonist.

According to the boys' unwritten code of honor a fight was now necessary, and the two lads understood it so, for in a twinkling they stood facing each other.

Harry stood as he had seen pugilists in pictures stand; the stranger lad seemed to the excited boys who watched him to be a mere novice in the art af fighting, since he held one arm loosely by his side, and had the other but slightly raised in front of him.

Harry hated to strike a boy so poorly prepared to guard himself, but he was angry enough to be willing to teach him a lesson, so he said, as he struck at him, "Take that."

Just where Harry's fist went out not even the lookers-on could see. Somehow the unguarded boy had evaded the blow, and had delivered in return a quick pat-pat that sent Harry reeling backward. And then, before he could recover himself, came another pat-pat that laid him flat upon his back.

The girls screamed, the boys crowded nearer, and the young pugilist stood alertly on guard, keeping his eye at once on Harry, struggling in a dazed way to his feet, and on the latter's friends, who were glancing at him with mingled curiosity and anger.

Nothing daunted, but seemingly stimulated by the prospect of more fighting to do, the stranger lad exclaimed, tauntingly: "Has he got enough yet, or does he want more?"

little girl saw the fierce fighter of a few minutes before crying bitterly.

Tears filled her own eyes, and after a moment of timid hesitation she stole up to the friendless lad and gently laid her little hand on his shoulder, and said, sympathetically: "Please don't cry, I'm so sorry for you!"

"G'way now, I tell you!" he snarled, jerking his shoulder from under the pitying hand. "Leave me alone."

She cast upon him a sorrowful look of wonder, and then turned and ran away.

The boy had rejected her offers of help and her sympathy with churlish distrust, but underneath the distrust an atom of hope had struggled for recognition, and therefore when the child accepted her repulse and ran away, a heavy despair smote the lads heart, and he threw himself at length on the grass, murmuring, as if it had but just come to him, "I'm so hungry!"

He had not lain there long when he heard approaching footsteps. He did not look up; he was reckless of the consequences of being seen there.

"Won't you please eat this? Indeed we wouldn't have you arrested for anything."

He looked up into the distressed face of the little girl, and then down at a heaped-up plate of food which she had placed beside him. Then without a word, but with frequent furtive glances at her as she leaned against the fence, he ate every morsel on the plate.

"What's your name?" he asked, abruptly, as she stooped to pick up the plate.

"Katie Morris."

There was an awkward pause, during which he seemed engaged in fixing her name in his memory. Presently to relieve her embarrassment, she asked, "What's yours?"

The lad's cheeks flushed and his brown eyes searched her blue ones as he answered slowly, "Dick."

"Dick what?"

Again he cast upon her a quick, searching glance, and then, hesitating a moment, said, "Won't you tell anybody if I tell you?"

"No—o," she answered, in uneasy surprise.

"Dick Rodriguez," he said, lowering his voice, and yet showing signs of some pride in the name.

She repeated the name, and he was evidently surprised that she showed no emotion at hearing it.

"Champion boy bare-back, you know," he said, in an explanatory tone.

"Oh," she ventured, doubtfully, "in a circus?"

He nodded his head proudly, and then with a sudden relapse into his ugly scowl, said: "He was allus a-lickin' me, an' I ran away. He ain't my father anyhow, an' he 'ain't no right to lick me. Don't you give me away if anybody comes around askin' for me, will you?"

"I won't," said Katie, at the same time frightened and pleased at being taken into the confidence of the runaway circus boy.

"Yes," said Dick, finding it pleasant to talk of his troubles and himself. "I've walked over a hundred miles. I'm going to Toronto. They don't let a feller beg, do they? I'm willing to work, but they all call me a tramp and drive me away."

Katie looked shocked; and then, seeing Dick was silent, asked him, by way of drawing him out, if he could ride that horse, pointing to the one grazing near by.

"Of course," he said, carelessly.

"But he's awful. Nobody can drive him or do anything with him. They can't even get near him."

"So," said Dick, eyeing the horse with critical interest. "Is he yours?"

"No—o; he belongs to Squire Blodgett, the boy's father."

"Well," said the Squire, impressed by Dick's earnestness, "I'll let you try; but mind, if you get killed, don't blame me."

"I won't. And about the pay for it?"

"Well, if you really do break the horse, I'll see you don't complain."

"No, sir, I want to make a fair, square bargain beforehand. I can break the horse, an' I want fair pay."

"You do. What is your price, then, my young Rarey?"

"A cow?"

"What?"

"A cow. I'll agree to break your horse to drive safe an' gentle, and I want you to give an order for the choice of your cows when it's done."

"You're very modest."

"It's worth it, an' you know it. What d'ye say?"

"Have it your own way. If you break the horse—and I begin to have some confidence in you—you'll have earned the cow. Can you catch the horse? Nobody here can."

"I can catch him. Can you give me a long piece of strong clothes line?"

It is unnecessary to tell by what means Dick subdued the Squire's horse, for subdue it he did, much to the Squire's amazement and delight. He employed a few simple devices well known to horse tamers, and did not occupy over an hour in making the vicious colt as gentle as an old horse.

The Squire endeavored to discover who the young horse-tamer was, but without success, for Dick refused to answer any questions; but having obtained the order giving the choice of the Squire's cows, he drew Harry to one side, and said: "That was mighty square of you to own up to the old man. Will you shake hands?"

Harry took his hand, and shook it heartily. Dick flushed, and after hesitating a minute, said, awkwardly, "You can write, I s'pose? I can't."

"Yes," answered Harry, "I can write. Do you want me to write something for you?"

"Yes; I want you to please put down plain on a piece of paper, 'Dick Rodriguez is no tramp; he pays for what he eats.'"

Harry wonderingly wrote as dictated, and then looked at Dick.

"Anybody can read that, Mr. ?"

"Oh yes."

"Then just put both papers in a envelope, and let Mrs. Morris have 'em—Katie Morris's mother, you know."

"I will."

Maple Centre talks to this day of Dick Rodriguez and how he paid for his dinner, and Dick Rodriguez is the proprietor of a big circus now.

There is one thing he never allows in his circus—children can never be abused there.

Eddie Williams, of Franklin, Me., went hunting, and the gun he carried "kicked" very hard when he fired it. A few days afterward he was taken ill and died. The recoil of the gun had caused concussion of the base of the brain, producing partial paralysis of the spine and digestive organs. about 20 in 1,000, while in New York it is 26 in 1,000. The population of New York is also much more crowded, there being an average of 16 persons to a dwelling, while in London the average is only 7.

The Rappel says that the gang which has lately issued false French bank notes is composed of wealthy Russians and Austrians. They possess ships and crews and all the necessary apparatus. The notes are engraved at sea and the plates are thrown overboard into the water. The ships put into ports where accomplices receive the notes, scatter them and give them back unused. Then the whole establishment travels to another port.

HEALTH.

Moderation and Regularity.

The means to be adopted for the attainment of robust health are cleanliness, regularity of habits, moderation in diet, exercise, preferably in the open air, in accordance with the capacity of the individual and nature of the contest, and abstinence from strong drinks and tobacco.

If a man trains simply to improve his health he does so more or less moderately; if for a contest, more or less strictly in accordance with the importance of the event. A man can do either without a trainer if he has an ordinary amount of common sense and will power. The man who simply desires to live in a sound, healthy condition should follow these rules, modifying them slightly, according to the age or physique:

Get up not later than 7 A. M., sponge and rub yourself with a coarse towel until the skin is red. It is good exercise. Then dress and take a fairly long walk before and after breakfast. Walk to your place of business. Attend to work in the usual way, resisting every inclination you may have to give way to indolence. Walk home. Never mind the weather; a little rain will not hurt you and Summer heat will not affect you when you have done it long enough to do you good. Then have dinner, avoiding, as at your lunch and breakfast, fat, greasy, sweet, highly flavored or seasoned food. Water is the best thing to drink and that is better drank after finishing your meal. Take your time over dinner in particular and other meals in general. If you have not time to get a meal leisurely go without it, as it will not injure you quarter as much as it will to eat it in a hurry. Amuse yourself in the evening according to your taste, which as you get healthier will incline to active rather than effeminate amusements. Repeat the sponging and rubbing and go to bed before 11 P.M.

A gentleman of our acquaintance on the shady side of 40, who is following this programme, stands about six feet and weighs nearly 200 pounds. He took my advice and has long since done away with his collection of medicines and embrocations, while since commencing he has had no occasion for a doctor. Neither the heat last Summer nor the cold this Winter troubled him. During the day business tasks have ceased to be burdensome, and at night he sleeps the sleep of the just. The little trouble it takes has become a pleasure, and he is quite satisfied that the benefit he has derived is worth more to him than he could pay for it. He never has any inclination for and can easily resist the temptation to partake of luxuries or bilious dishes.

The professional should train more strictly. Nearly all the time he is not sleeping or eating he should spend out of doors or in practising that, or some part of that, feat which he is training for. Neither amateur nor professional should work too hard at first, but should at all times bear in mind that over-exertion is more harmful than insufficient exercise. I advocate the subjugation but not the extinction of any natural desire. A requirement of nature should always afford pleasure, but should never become a propensity. If a person desires to improve deportment, grace and freedom of motion, and to acquire vigor, he should box or fence, or both, taking lessons at first that he may commence with a good system.

A Lesson From a Pugilist.

In writing lately on muscle-forming food, we referred to the interdependence between the different bodily organs and tissues, so that the body, to be properly built up, must Follicular tonsillitis is a more serious form of sore throat. It is perhaps due to an infectious element, but even this is generally powerless where the physical condition of the person who is exposed to it is otherwise good. In this case, too, the stomach may be the prime offender. More frequently the disease comes to those whose physical condition is depressed by bad hygienic surroundings.

There are feverish symptoms, the tonsils are inflamed and swollen, and covered more or less with small white circular spots. These may individually enlarge, so as to form patches somewhat resembling the characteristic patch of diphtheria, which, however, is a skin like membrane, while the patches in tonsillitis are merely an exudation on the surface, which can be wiped off. The case should, nevertheless, always have the care of a physician.

Sometimes the tonsils become greatly inflamed, with a tendency to abscess. It becomes difficult to swallow, and, indeed, to open the mouth. Behind the lower jaw a painful swelling is observed.

The difficulty may increase for several days, and then the inflammation may go down, or, what is quite as likely to happen, a very painful abscess may be formed, on the evacuation of which the symptoms subside. This is what is often called quinsy.

"Soda-Water."

The drinking of so called "soda-water" is becoming more and more general. Soda fountains are found not only in drug stores, but in restaurants, bar-rooms, confectionery stores, and retail merchant establishments.

All are familiar with the effervescence and foam that attend the mixing in water of carbonate of soda and tartaric acid. As the term "soda" is applied both to the fountain and to the drink issuing from it, one naturally supposes that there is soda in the foaming fluid he is taking.

It is not so, however. The water is charged with carbonic acid, and is flavored and sweetened with some of the various syrups. The carbonic acid gas forced into water with a pressure of one hundred and eighty pounds to the square inch, and it is the escape of this gas, when the faucet is turned and the water flows into the tumbler, that causes the foaming.

The gas was formerly obtained from carbonate of soda, and hence the present name, which still clings to it; but it is now obtained from marble, which is a carbonate of lime. Marble is simply lime and carbonic acid chemically combined. The union is a weak one. Sulphuric acid has a much stronger affinity for the lime than the carbonic acid has, and upon being poured on powdered marble releases the carbonic acid, which is then absorbed by the water. It makes no difference with the drink whether the carbonic acid is obtained from soda or from marble, since nothing but the acid passes into the water.

In, and in the neighborhood of, large cities, the sellers of soda-water do not charge their own fountains. It is done for them at large central establishments.

The question has been put to us if soda-water is wholesome. Almost any acidulated drink is pleasant in summer, and it often meets a real need to the system. Probably carbonated water is as wholesome as any.

We should advise less of the syrup than is commonly taken, partly because it is apt not to be pure, and partly because, even if pure, it is not very good for the stomach. "Plain soda" is better than soda with syrup, and, after a little time, quite a pleasant as that.

We believe that care is taken to have the

MANHOOD

How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

In writing lately on muscle-forming food, we referred to the interdependence between the different bodily organs and tissues, so that the body, to be properly built up, must be built up as a whole. Even muscular development may be carried to such an extent as to impoverish the brain and reduce the fat below what is required as surplus food against emergencies, as a protection against cold, and to supply those parts which consist largely of fat—the brain, nerves and marrow.

For, while surplus fat is an incumbrance, and sometimes a disease, a normal amount —and this not small—is as essential as muscular fibre.

An illustration of some of these principles is given by the experience of Sullivan, the pugilist, in his recent fight in France, and it is perhaps the only useful consequence of that brutal encounter.

Sullivan had spent six weeks in preparing for the contest, and is said in that time to have reduced his weight forty pounds—at the rate of nearly a pound a day! But while thus getting rid of fat, he was not at the same equally building up muscular fibre. This is a far slower process than "training down to weight."

Moreover, the loss of fat made him oversensitive to the chilling rain, in the midst of which the fight was carried on, while the muscles needed an extra support for their long-continued and exhausting work. At the same time the nerve power was greatly reduced, for the fat, of which the brain and nerves so largely consist, is as essential to their normal action as is any other constituent. And, indeed, this nerve-power is the working force of the system as truly as steam is of the engine.

Says Mr. John Boyle O'Reilly, the well-known poet and writer, and a good authority in physical culture: "Sullivan was over-trained. This is the rule rather than the exception with English trainers.

"They reduce a man's nervous or vital force to build up his muscular powers, and they take out all his fat, so that he gets chilled when he strips, and cannot heat again.

"It was just the same when Heenan fought King in England. He was a marvel of beauty when he stripped, but before the fourth round his breath was roaring in him as he said himself. He had to come to a stop while his muscles were filled with power, because there was no nervous force to drive the muscles."

This is admirably put, but it is hardly proper for Mr. O'Rielly to say, "while the muscles were filled with power." There was only a capacity for the use of power—the nervous force—which the central nervous system was not then in a condition to furnish to the degree required.

Sore Throats.

Few ailments are more common than sore throats, yet they are largely preventable. That is, they seldom come to one in vigorous health, except as the result of some violation of physical law.

The more simple form of sore throat is commonly due to exposure to inclement weather, but often indirectly to a disturbed stomach. In fact, it is not unfrequently due to this cause alone. The person says he has taken cold, and wonders how he could have done so, while the truth is, he has not taken cold at all.

The stomach, æsophagus, mouth, nose, etc., are lined with a mucous membrane continuous through this whole region, and the irritation begun in the stomach is propagated over the whole mucous surface. In all such cases the seat of the trouble is the stomach, and accordingly the efforts at cure, whether by medicine, by diet, or by treatment, should be directed to that organ.

"Plain soda" is better than soda with syrup, and, after a little time, quite a pleasant as that.

We believe that care is taken to have the water pure, and to keep the apparatus free from corrosive matter, and when this done, no harm is likely to result from a moderate resort to the fountain.

Precautions Against Sunstroke.

The full meaning of sunstroke is not included in that term. Heatstroke or insolation is a better word, and implies a further peril besides the downright glare of an unclouded sun. The concentrated heat of a close workroom, as well as the exposure incurred by some careless laborers in the open field may lead to most serious consequences. The exhaustion of work also, particularly if clothing is heavy, is a predisposed condition which should not be lost sight of. Ventilation, regular nutrition, light clothing, and, as far as possible, remission of the pressure of work, are strongly indicated by the weather conditions under which we are now living, and we therefore venture to impress their importance alike on employer and employed. Beer and other stimulants are hurtful rather than helpful, and the substitution of non-intoxicant cooling drinks for those beverages is a truly scientifi and sanitary advance in public taste. Protection of the head is a subject which is now fairly well understood. It should not be forgotten that the neck as well as the cranium requiries to be covered.

A Torch for Insect Nests.

A late bulletin (No. 10) issued by the entomologist, Prof. C. V. Riley, of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, gives the following directions for making a torch to be used in burning the nest of such insects as the orchard caterpiller and fall web worm. Take a piece of soft brick known as salmon brick, and trim it to an egg shape; then take two flexible wires, cross them over the brick, wrap them around it, and twist the ends together. Then attach it by the wires to a long stick, and soak the brick in coal oil; light it with a match, and you are armed for the work. Asbestos may be used to advantage; and a little thorough work early enough in the season, will obviate the necessity of more expensive remedies at a later time. The soaking in the oil may be repeated as often as required to maintain the flame.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

Universal Grief at the German Emperor's Death—Gratitude to the English Doctor—The Mikado of Japan Discouraged by the Results of His Liberel Rule.

Among the members of the English royal family the feeling even stronger than that of grief at the Emperor Frederick's death is gratitude to Sir Morell Mackenzie, without whose skill the Queen's eldest daughter would never have been Empress, but lived a royal pauper, depending on her wealthy mother and the unreliable charity of the German Reichstag. Sir Morell Mackenzie intends taking a trip of three weeks on the Continent before returning to England. When he does come back there is no doubt that he will be made a baronet, and it is even believed that the custom which has hitherto prevented any medical man from being made a peer may be abolished in his favor. All sorts of extravagant guesses have been made as to the amount paid to Mackenzie by his royal patient. The amount which he has really received is payment at the rate of $100,000 a year ever since he took charge of the case. On his return there is no doubt that his practice and income as a physician will be greater than that of any doctor in England.

The sympathy felt for the late Emperor and the grief at his death among English people are very great. No foreign monarch's death has ever caused so much sincere sorrow. His fortitude and simplicity, which are qualities much admired in England, won for him the liking of the English people. Innumerable anecdotes and endless memoirs have been written of his life.

The Mikado of Japan is disappointed in his queer-eyed subjects. They failed to appreciate the liberal edicts by which he granted them freedom of press and permission to do as they liked. The press devotes itself principally to poking fun at the royal family, and the people have been industriously forming themselves into all kinds of secret societies, which his Majesty considers objectionable. Now the press has been remuzzled, the societies have been broken up, and the Mikado announces that he will resume his line of conduct as a well-meaning despot.

SAVING A CHILD FROM AN ALLIGATOR.

Thrilling Experience of Life in California.

A family named Lambert living on Lake Charlie Apopka, California, or Tsala Lake, as it is called, report a very thrilling experience. The family is composed of Mr. and Mrs. Lambert and three children, two boys and a girl baby, the boys being 8 and 15 respectively, and the girl just able to toddle about. They moved there some two years ago and preempted a homestead on the south side of the lake.

The house is built about 20 feet from the lake and on a slight elevation, the land in front sloping down gradually to the water's edge. At the left, off some little distance, is an immense saw grass pond. Near this Mr. Lambert built an enclosure for his pigs, one side facing the lake, and up to a month ago he had a magnificent lot of porkers. One night several weeks ago he heard

Suddenly, with a heavy sinking of the heart, she felt that her foot was in the water, and that, if no help came, she was doomed to a terrible death.

for a moment, and she made another frantic effort to free herself, but it was in vain, and she felt herself drawn into the water. Suddenly her hands, which were nervously clutching at anything and everything that seemed to promise support, passed over the the axe handle. With the swiftness of thought and with superhuman energy she seized the helve and scrambled up, and how she cannot say. She managed to deal the 'gator a heavy blow with the blade. With rare good fortune it struck his other eye and crushed into the head. The maddened and wounded reptile opened its jaws with a roar of pain and rage, and Mrs. Lambert's dress slipped off its huge teeth. Scrambling up she seized her baby and fled wildly to the house and fell on the porch in in a dead faint.

Her husband, on returning home at night, found her there unconscious, with the child patting her mother's cheek and trying to arouse her. Doctors were at once summoned, but at last accounts the sorely tried mother was living over again her heroic fight in the fever of delirium. The next day Mr. Lambert went to the lake, and at the same spot soon found out the old 'gator lurking in the weeds. As footsteps were heard approaching, he came forth menacingly, but two shots from a 44 calibre Winchester soon placed him hors de combat. The wounds in his head were deep, and showed that the mother's arm had struck a terrible blow. The little child was not hurt, as the 'gator's teeth had caught in its dress.

ENGLISH AS VOLAPUK.

Anglo-Saxon Gradually Becoming the Language of all the World.

A universal language must be a growth. Some national language must expand until it covers the whole world. Of late years the English language alone has been much spoken of as likely to grow so great. Hardly any philosophic linguist attempts to forecast the future without some discussion of the destiny of English; and De Candolle calculates that within 100 years English will be spoken by 860,000,000 of men, German by 124,000,000 and French by 96,000,000. At present the populations either speaking the English language or under the domination of English-speaking peoples number more than 318,298,000, or one-fourth of the population of the globe.

English-speaking races occupy one-fourth of the dry land of the earth, and own nearly two-thirdsof the tonnage of the ships. They live in all regions; they handle all articles of trade; they preach to all nations; they command one-half of the world's gold and silver, and distribute more than two-thirds of the Bibles and Testaments. More than one-half of the letters mailed and carried by the postal service of the world are written, mailed and read by the English-speaking populations, The expectation that English will come into universal use is not based upon anything in the nature of the language, but rather on the character and circumstances of the people.

The English people have been the great colonizers of modern times. They have taken possession of America, of Australia, of South Africa, the regions which are to be the seam of new empires, and they control and assimilate the populations which flow into them and which grow up in them.

The Water of Lake Superior.

A Mother's Dream Verified.

An inquest, which Mr William Carter styled one of the strangest that had ever come before his notice, was held at the Branksome Arms, Branksome Road, Brixton, England, recently. The deceased was Alice Elizabeth Baker, aged four years, the daughter of George Baker, a postman, living at 24 Branksome Road. The mother stated that at about half-past six o'clock in the morning she had a dream, in which she thought her child was dying, and heard a voice saying, "How happy it is to die in peace." She woke up suddenly, thinking she heard her child cry "Mother mother!" Hurrying to the bedside she found the child dying. Medical aid was at once summoned, but the child died a few minutes later from congestion of the lungs. The jury returned a verdict of "Death from natural causes."

Not So Soft as They Look.

"Country boys are not such squash-heads as they sometimes look," said the sociable drummer at the Broezel house. "One day last week I was out riding with a fellow who seemed to think it his mission to say or do something smart every minute. Presently we overtook a barefoot urchin driving a cow home from pasture, and my companion reined up the horse and spoke to him, saying, 'Say, my little man, what time will it be at six o'clock this afternoon?' Without a moment's hesitation the lad answered:—'Twill be bedtime for hens and fools. You're not a hen, but 'twill be your bedtime all the same.'"

"She's Much Older Than Her Husband."

We heard a young girl make the above remark the other day about a lady with whom we are slightly acquainted. It was not true, yet the lady in question actually does look five years older than her husband, although she is really several years his junior. She is prematurely aged, and functional derangement is the cause. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription would cure her, and should be recommended to her, and to all others who are in the same condition. If the reader of this chances to be a similar sufferer, let her get the "Prescription." It will back her lost beauty, and, better still, it will remove all those distressing symptoms which have made life a burden to her so long. Money refunded if it don't give satisfaction. The great talker's definition of a bore: "One who's always talking about his affairs when I want to talk about mine."

Whenever your Stomach or Bowels get out of order, causing Biliousness, Dyspepsia, or Indigestion

Mr. Lambert built an enclosure for his pigs, one side facing the lake, and up to a month ago he had a magnificent lot of porkers. One night several weeks ago he heard in his hog pen, and hurrying out with his shot gun and lantern, he was just in time to see one of his fine hogs disappearing in the lake in the mouth of a huge alligator, while the scores of balls of fire seen glittering in the darkness on the lake showed the presence of others.

From that beginning their inroads were kept up with great regularity, and though he killed a dozen or more, yet the pork was too nice for them to relinquish their feeding ground. Lately they have grown so bold as to crawl into his yard in daytime, and the predatory raids of the marauders on his hogs and fowls have rendered Mr. Lambert's life a burden.

A recent adventure, however, of two members of his family with one of these dreadful creatures has so terrified the farmer and has so alarmed his entire household that he is seriously contemplating abandoning his place. One Saturday afternoon a short time ago Mrs. Lambert, who was in the back part of the house, was

of her little girl and frantic cries of "Mamma! Mamma!" Hurrying to the front of the house, she could not at first locate the little one's whereabouts, but her piercing screams continued, and the almost frantic mother soon discovered the flutter of her child's dress near the lake shore, the palmetto bushes nearly hiding from her view. Snatching up an axe from the wood-pile, she flew to the water's edge, and as she rounded the palmetto patch a sight burst upon her that nearly drove her crazy. On the edge of the bank, with its body half in the water, was a huge alligator with its forepaws outstretched, raising it from the ground, while its tail lashed the water into foam. Just in front of it, and clinging to a palmetto root with her tiny hands for dear life, was the little girl, her dress being held in the jaws of the alligator, who was slowly dragging the child. The alligator's dull eyes gleamed with anger, like red coals of fire, and when Mrs. Lambert appeared the monster uttered a hoarse bellow and started backward, tearing loose the child's slight hold.

The latter's infantile features were drawn into an agonized appeal and as the animal dragged her down she was too completely paralyzed with fear to even cry out. The peril of her baby banished all fear from Mrs. Lambert, and she rushed up and over the head with the axe, and, seizing the child with both hands, tried to pull her away.

The sharp blade cut into the alligator's eye, and mad, with pain, he opened his jaw and half sprang at the woman. This left the child free, and they both fell backward Mrs. Lambert said afterward that at this moment she never expected to save her life.

As she fell the alligator swung around its tail with a terrible sounding whisk, but the fortunate fall of the two just placed them outside its deadly sweep. The alligator advanced as far as it could with unwieldy waddle, and Mrs Lambert attempted to rise and escape. Her dress caught on a root, and before she could get up and free herself. the alligator made a snap at her and missed, catching hold of her dress instead. Finding that it had secured something it commenced backing toward the water, dragging along the prostrate woman, who now fully realized her peril, and filled the air with her cries for help. She frantically clutched at the roots as she was dragged over them, but her dress was of stout material, and the alligator's strength soon overcame her feeble resistance.

which grow up in them.

The Water of Lake Superior.

How cold the dark water of Lake Superior is! One evening when we were steaming across that lake I asked the mate what was done when a man fell overboard. He coolly replied, "Nothing." "Why?" I asked, astonished at his heartlessness. "The water of Lake Superior is so cold that a man cannot live in it during the time it takes to stop a rapidly moving vessel and lower a boat," he replied. Then he added: "I have sailed on this lake for twenty years. During that time I have known many men to fall off vessels. I know of one man only who escaped death. He was saved by a scratch. The others were apparently killed by the shock produced by falling into such cold water." He picked up an empty can to which a long string was attached and cast it overboard. The can skipped from the crest of one wave to that of another for an instant, then dipped and filled. The hoary-headed mate drew the full can up and handed it to me, saying, "Take a drink of that, and then say what you think of your chances of swimming in Lake Superior for ten or fifteen minutes." I drank deeply, and it was as though liquid ice flowed down my throat. "It is alleged," the mate said, "that this lake never gives up its dead, that to be drowned in Lake Superior is to be buried for all time. I do not know whether this is true or not, but I do know that I have never seen a corpse floating on the lake." I wonder if that is true? I doubted it, but I could find no sailor who had ever seen a dead body floating on the Lake.

Where Women Excel.

Women may not have a great head for many things, but they have for secreting valuables. There was a woman on Holly avenue who possesses some handsome diamonds. She puts them in a box, puts the box in a rag bag, puts the rag bag on the closet floor, and at night puts the watch dog in the closet on the top of the rag bag and locks him in there, and every night hides the key in a different place. Her husband says that if she had her way she would arm him to the teeth and put him in the closet with the dog.

Too Much for Him.

At the close of an amateur theatrical performance a gentleman was discovered in a fainting condition. Great beads of perspiration stood upon his brow, and his face was ashy white.

"Great heavens! what is the trouble?" was the excited inquiry.

"Ladies and gentlemen," gasped the unfortunate man, faintly, "I'm the author of the play."

A NERVE TONIC.

GEORGE W. BOUTON, STAMFORD, CONN., says: "For two years I was a sufferer from nervous debility, and I thank God and the discoverer of the valuable remedy that PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND cured me. It is a valuable remedy. Long may it live. Let any one write to me for advice."

AN ALTERATIVE.

ALONZO ABBOTT, WINDSOR, VT., says: "I believe PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND saved my life. My trouble seemed to be an internal humor. Before I used it I was covered with an eruption from "head to heel." The eruption is rapidly healing, and I am five hundred per cent. better every way."

A LAXATIVE.

A. C. BEAN, WHITE RIVER JUNCTION, VT., says: For two years past I have been a great sufferer from kidney and liver troubles, attended with dyspepsia and constipation. Before I began to take CELERY COMPOUND it seemed as though everything ailed me. Now I can say nothing ails me.

A DIURETIC.

GEORGE ABBOTT, SIOUX CITY, Iowa, says: "I have been using PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND and it has done me more good for kidneys and lame back than any other medicine I have ever taken.

for us. Cash furnished on satisfactory guaranty Address, C. S. PAGE, Hyde Park, Vermont, U S.

The Shoe and Leather Reporter, N.Y., and Shoe and Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers in the U. S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison, the Reporter gives him this endorsement;

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor, and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr. Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in his specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the lagrest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality, he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

—Every person doing a large business requires a heavy scale of five or ten tons capacity. And business competition is so keen that inventors are hard at work trying to keep up with the times to save time and labor, which are always capital to the most of our business men. —Although school is about closed for the summer holidays the following, which we clip from an exchange, will be read with interest by teachers, if not by parents: An interesting case has just been decided by Chief Justice Armour. A lady teacher in Ramsay township suspended a boy for misconduct—disobedience—until he should offer an apology. She was backed by the trustees, and the "Old Man" backed the boy by applying for a mandamus to compel his admittance. The judge dimissed the application, ordering the "Old Man" to pay all the cost. His Lordship said that the teacher and trustees were right, and that the father ought to have compelled his son to acknowledge he was wrong in what he did and to go quietly back to school.

He has supplied two cakes; one weighing 50lbs and the other 46. Both were handsome table ornaments, great taste being shown in the selection of the flowers, etc. And not only were they nice looking but the cake itself was A. 1. This THE EXPRESS can vouch for having been favored with a piece of the former. Photos of the two cakes Mr Davis has on exhibition in his parlors.

—Saturday last among the many teams standing on the market was Mr. Marshal Wagar's. Becoming frightened at a piece of paper flying about, the horses started out from their place in the row and turning west started to runaway with Mrs Wagar in the wagon. The commotion occasioned four other teams to start off, and it looked as though there was going to be a general stampede. Fortunately the four were checked in time to save damage. Not so with Mr Wagar's, however. They continued west, increasing their speed as they proceeded. Shortly after they cleared the other rigs, Mr G. W. Wagar, son of the owner, ran out and caught the rein of the off horse, but could not stop them. At the corner of Centre-st the horses turned north and in doing so threw the wagon almost entirely off the street. The young man was here thrown to the ground, and narrowly escaped being trampled on and run over. After throwing Mrs Wagar and the contents of the vehicle out, the wagon was carried on to the corner of Bridge-st, Here the horses took one on each side of the telegraph pole. Breaking the double tree in two the animals were free of the wagon. One was caught before proceeding further; the other continued north with G.W. after him as hard as he could run. The horse was captured on the common near the railroad track. Both animals were slightly hurt in the feet, but nothing serious. One hind wheel of the wagon was "dished" and the double-tree broken. Mrs Wagar, who was thrown on the sidewalk, was at first thought to be seriously injured as blood was running from her nose and she could not straighten up. A doctor being close at hand was immediately at her side, and had her assisted to Mr Smith's shop. On examination it was found that she was more stunned than injured. After resting a little she revived and when the rig was ready proceeded with her husband to the home in Camden. Mr. G. W. Wagar had his pants torn and received a bruise on the knee; otherwise he was not injured.

Mr Emsley's Farewell.

Sunday evening last the Rev W. H. Emsley occupied the pulpit of the Eastern Methodist church for the last time as pastor of the term just expired. The church was well filled, representatives being in attendance from each of the Protestant and R. C. churches. The opening hymn was the 612th and the reading lesson the 34th Psalm, both appropriate to the occasion, as was also the anthem, "Onward," by the choir. The text was Eph. 6 : 10—"Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might." It is needless to say that the discourse was a good one. Mr Emsley appeared to be fully at home as ever, although he at the close said that it was with considerable difficulty he preached. He reviewed the history of the church from its inception to the present age, and held Christ up as a noble example. He offered kind words of advice to the congregation—the young people were asked to select the best literature and avoid flippancy of life ; the church to avoid formality which stifles enthusiasm and to be strong in faith, in prayer and the consolation which history brings. The three years he had spent in Napanee had been three happy years. Although the work on his part had been inperfect, he had striven to exalt Jesus only—never to stand between Christ and man. Whilst in Napanee he had had many joys here it was that his greatest sorrow had come upon him—the death of his father. He thanked the friends, not only of his own congregation but of all for the very great kindness shown him. He hoped by the grace of God to meet all in the better land. The rev. gentleman closed with some good advice regarding the incoming pastor—receive him kindly, give him hearty sympathy and do not keep reminding him of the one just gone—and a prayer that heaven's choicest blessings might rest on all. Mr Emsley omitted the closing exercise and upon the voluntary, usually played during the lifting of the collection, being finished, arose and

DEATH'S DOINGS.

SHARP.

Saturday last death removed from our midst a well known figure, in the person of old Mr. Robt Sharp. About two weeks ago the old gentleman had a paralytic stroke, from which he never recovered, although not completely helpless. He was quite conscious up to the last and died quite easily. For over twenty years Mr. Sharp was a resident of Napanee, and worked here at the tailoring during a considerable portion of the time. For the last two years he has been very stooped, but up to that time was an exceedingly upright figure. He was born at Quebec and at an early age started out to see the world for himself, travelling through a great portion of Canada and many of the States. Mr. Sharp leaves a wife and only daughter, Mrs W. A. Baker, to mourn his loss.

ROE.

Wednesday Mr Alex H. Roe, third son of the late A. H. Roe, M. P. P., died at Wingham, in his nineteenth year. Alex had been poorly all winter and at Easter give up teaching, which he had followed for some time—the first year at the school on the Kingston road east of Napanee and latterly at Mount Pleasant school, on the Belleville road—with the view of recruiting. He commenced to improve and his many friends thought that he would soon be in his usual health. About a month ago he left for Wingham to spend a time with the family of his uncle, Alfred Roe, Esq. Nothing unfavorable was heard until a week ago when word was received that he had had a bad attack of what the doctor said was bronchial asthma. His eldest sister at that time proceeded to Wingham and was pleased to send word that he had recovered and was out of danger. By the noon mail of Wednesday his mother received a letter penned by himself stating that he felt as well as when he left here. The feelings of the mother can be better imagined than described when we state that in the evening word was received that he had been again attacked and half an hour after another telegram announcing his death. Miss Roe, along with the uncle, accompanied the remains to Napanee on last night's train. The funeral will take place to-day at 2 p.m. from the house, Centre-st, to the church of England; thence to the Napanee cemetery.

CULHANE.

Another of our young men departed this life this week, in the person of Mr Wm Culhane. For some time he had been ailing from that generally fatal disease, consumption. Last fall he visited Denver, Col., for the benefit of his health, but it did not appear to do him any good. About two months ago he returned and since has been visiting friends here and at Deseronto. At the time of his death he was stopping at his uncle's, Mr McCallum, at the Indian Woods, near Deseronto. The funeral took place yesterday afternoon, the remains being interred in the R. C. cemetery here.

The first bid was by Thompson, 8⅞ for the board, which ran up to 9¼ by Bartlett, after which selections were made.

All the factories having colored accepted Thompson's bid of 9¼, except Conway and Centreville.

Bath accepted Thompson's offer of 9½.

Bartlett's offer of 9½ was accepted by Platt.

Centreville and Conway sold to Downey for 9⅞c.

McCargar bought Napanee's make of white at 9½c.

Bartlett's offer of 9½ for Amherst Island, subject to inspection at Montreal, was accepted.

MILK CASE.

Skimmed and Diluted Milk Furnished Empey Cheese Factory.

Wednesday Mr. Ira Pringle appeared before Magistrate Doller to answer a charge, preferred by Inspector Rollins, of supplying Empey cheese factory with skimmed and diluted milk. Mr. S. B. Burdett, M. P., of Belleville, appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. W. S. Herrington, of Herrington & Warner, Napanee, for the defence.

At the opening the plaintiff's counsel objected to the jurisdiction of the justice, as he was interested in a cheese factory, being president of the Napanee factory.

The following evidence was taken:

JAS. LUCAS, sworn, said.—I draw milk to the Empey cheese factory; drew milk on the 5th to the factory; I got the milk on the stand at Ira Pringle's; I am acquainted with Mr. Pringle; saw him put milk in the cans when I drew it; I quite often see himself and the rest of his family; himself and family live by themselves; I live two and a half miles from Pringle's; saw Mr. Cleall at the factory; don't remember pointing out Mr. Pringle's milk to Mr. Cleall; I supposed Mr. Cleall was at the factory for the purpose of testing milk; he took a sample from each can; my particular business was to deliver the milk of the patrons at the factory; each persons can was delivered separately at the factory; never delivered one man's milk as the property of another; if I did point out or call out Mr. Pringle's milk to Mr. Cleall, I did it truly; I saw Mr. Cleall take samples of the milk for the purpose of testing it; the milk I received was delivered as I received it from the patrons; the milk I took from Mr. Pringle's stand was delivered in the same state at the factory; Mr. Pringle's can had his name upon it; Mr. Pringle has resided continuously on the same farm; Mr. Pringle told me that if it was watered, some other person had done it; this conversation took place the next morning after the inspector was there; it took place at the milk stand; he told me the inspector had accused him of watering his milk; he said if it was watered some other person had done it; suggested that some person from a distance might have done it; the first conversation with him was on the morning of the sixth; I may have had several conversations with him since; don't remember just the number of times I have talked with him since; may have talked with him two or three times since; have talked to several respecting the matter; Mr. Pringle asked me if I saw any difference in his can of milk on the morning of the fifth; I told him I did not; I told him I did not look at his milk that morning; I thought he poured a pail of milk in his can off the stand that morning; I delivered his milk at the factory; I told him I did not notice his milk particularly at the stand; don't think I said to Mr. Pringle that I made a mistake in handing his milk over to the factory.

P. E. R. MILLER, sworn, said:—I am tested at the Empey cheese factory, according to the tests made of Mr. Pringle's milk, showed that the cream had been removed and the milk watered; the average of the gauge is from 1 to 1½ inch; never knew pure milk to show as low as ½ inch; the standard of the ether gauge would be from 9 to 12; never knew June milk to show as low as 6 marks on the ether test; there have been five cases within my jurisdiction tried in court and eight or nine cases confessed; there have been no cases appealed; there was a case that tested 7 in this county and the party confessed; the Association have Mr. Rollins and James Whitton employed as inspectors; they are subject to my direction. Cross-examined—My jurisdiction extends from Toronto to Quebec; the lactometer and cream gauge combined are reliable and accurate.

ROBERT ROLLINS, sworn, said:—I am milk inspector, appointed by the Dairymen's Association; tested the milk given me by Mr. Cleall as Mr. Pringle's milk; I made two tests; the milk was placed in compartment 30 of the box; the tests were properly and accurately made; the milk was in a proper state to give it a fair test; pure milk at that factory should show from 1 to 1½ in. on the gauge and by the cream test 10 marks; I tested four samples with the ether test; showed from 8 to 11 marks except Mr. Pringle's which showed four marks; I tested 61 samples; the tests averaged from 1 to 1½ in.; the tests were all properly made; the milk said to be Mr. Pringle's had been watered and skimmed; I pronounced it so before testing it; there is no doubt of the ether test being accurate and reliable; Mr. Cleall was with me and I left him at the factory while I went to Mr. Pringle's to get the milk; he said the milk I tested was the same as got from him; I told him the milk was poor, the worst I had tested this season; I milked two cows out clean; the milk that was taken from the cows that evening was less than half that morning; the nights milk would be generally more than the mornings; I tested that with the ether test and it showed nine marks; that test was properly made, as well as the others, and Mr. Pringle's milk of that day should show 9 marks. Cross-examined.—Went to Empey factory on the evening of the fouth of July; I am informed in this case the first milk I tested at the factory was Mr. Pringle's; I always make the tests by the cream gauge; I tested Mr. Pringle's milk by the two processes because the milk was poor; the ether test and lactometer combined are reliable; the ether test alone is reliable; the cream gauge and lactometer are reliable; the cream gauge and lactometer combined would be accurate and reliable in testing; No. 30, the milk I think delivered to the factory, was in four pails; I don't think there was 70 lbs of milk; the cows did not appear to be milked out; I tested milk to-day with the ether test, given to me as Mr. Pringle's milk.

GEORGE CLEALL, on being recalled, said:—The milk Mr. Rollins tested to-day was taken out of Mr. Pringle's can at the factory, after it was turned out of the can into the weigh can, and it showed 12 marks.

Defendant's counsel objected on the ground that the milk was not identified. He further objected that before a prima facie case could be made out the comparison must be made in accordance with section 7 of the statute providing against frauds in the supplying of milk to cheese factories.

The plaintiff's counsel refused to allow Mr. and Mrs. Pringle to give evidence and the case was closed.

The court, after a short adjournment, reassembled, when Magistrate Doller gave his decision to the effect that the case was proven, and fined Mr. Pringle $40 and costs, $9.50

Mr Pringle has decided to appeal the case to —A fine new ten-ft. sidewalk has been laid down in front of Lahey & McKenty's dry goods store. It was done under the supervision of St. Com. Chairman Davis and Chief Allen, who were assisted in the instruction line by quite a number of outsiders. When it came to sawing the outer edge straight, friend T. G's. instructions were useless. Mordecai Sanderson, the contractor, knew how to do it and had his way too.

—The excursion of the Eastern Methodist Sabbath School on Tuesday last was an enjoyable one. The str. Quinte left the wharf here about 9 o'clock with a good load, and returned again at 6.30 p.m, without the least occurrence of any kind happening to mar the day's pleasure. The committee, which we stated last week were tory; I told him I did not notice his milk particularly at the stand; don't think I said to Mr. Pringle that I made a mistake in handing his milk over to the factory.

P. E. R. MILLER, sworn, said:—I am manager of the Empey cheese factory; I was with the inspector at Mr. Pringle's on the fifth to get milk to test; he attempted to milk some of his cows; I saw the milk in the cans. Cross-examined—Did not authorize, appoint, or tell Mr. Rollins to test Mr. Pringle's milk; Mr. Rollins and Mr. Pringle's family milked the cows and put the milk in the can; the cows were milked about 6 o'clock; would have perhaps gave more if they had been milked at 7; think there was not the ordinary quantity of milk in the can; I judged there was fifty-five pounds of milk in Mr. Pringle's can; the can when full I think would hold about two hundred pounds; think the can was thirty inches high; think there was twelve inches of milk in the can.

THOMAS EMPEY, sworn, said:—I am owner of the Empey cheese factory; never got notice from Mr. Pringle that his milk was skimmed or diluted with water; I did not authorize or appoint Mr. Rollins to test the milk at Mr. Pringle's.

GEORGE CLEALL, sworn, said:—I have been a cheesemaker about twenty years; have had occasion several times during that time to test milk; was at the factory on the morning of the fifth; saw the milk of the evening of the fourth and morning of the fifth delivered at the Empey cheese factory; that load was delivered by Mr. Lucas; he called out the name of Ira Pringle as he put his can upon the scales; I took samples of his milk and samples of about sixty-four from other cans too; I took the proper means to test all the samples; the tests were fairly and properly made; ordinary milk as taken from the cow will average from one inch to one and a half inches; Mr. Pringle's milk averaged one-fourth inch; the other samples tested about one inch; all were fair samples; Mr. Pringle's was the lowest; don't think there was any of the other samples quite half so bad as Mr. Pringle's; was not at Mr. Pringle's home; saw Mr. Rollins test Mr. Pringle's milk with the ether test; I saw him test it; I think the test was properly made; the test showed four marks each; the average test in that factory is about ten marks; tested four samples with ether test; the lowest was eight marks, except Mr. Pringle's; I made an average test; the sample next to Mr. Pringle's was the next lowest; I think these tests are reliable; I would judge the milk had been watered; I would judge from its low test that it had been both skimmed and watered. Cross-examined—The cream gauge I tested Mr. Pringle's milk with I took with me from my own factory; don't know that Mr. Gerow put the No. 30 opposite Mr. Pringle's name; I heard Mr. Gerow say he did; I think the milk had not been tampered with while being transferred; I arrived at the factory in the night; I unlocked the box in the morning after the delivery of the milk, and the milk drawer had left; the test was under my supervision during the time of the delivery of the milk, about 1½ hours, and don't think any person could possibly have touched the box containing the test; the only knowledge I had that Mr. Pringle's milk had been put into No. 30 was that the milk drawer called out Mr. Pringle's name and I called 30, and Mr. Gerow put it down.

J. K. MCCARGAR, sworn, said:—I am president of the Eastern Dairymen's Association; have had experience in testing milk for 14 or 15 years; if tests are properly made there can be no mistake as to the accuracy of the tests, and I have never known to fail if properly made; the milk and Mrs. Pringle to give evidence and the case was closed.

The court, after a short adjournment, reassembled, when Magistrate Doller gave his decision to the effect that the case was proven, and fined Mr. Pringle $40 and costs, $9.50

Mr Pringle has decided to appeal the case to the quarter sessions, the papers for which were served yesterday.

CHEESE.

Inspector Rollins, who has been in this section for some time, has had a number of excuses offered him by those interferring with their milk. The principal one advanced is that the cans were interferred with during the night. Mr. Rollins asks that all patrons look into their cans before pouring in their morning's milk. It can easily be seen whether the milk has been tampered with after they have stood a couple of hours.

Inspector Rollins and Mr. Cleall have been diligent in their work of inspecting the milk furnished the factories in this section, and have succeeded in bringing to book a number of law-breakers. On Saturday a patron of Napanee factory acknowledged skimming his milk and paid $25 in settlement. Another party, a patron of Sillsville factory, also acknowledged the corn and settled by paying a like amount. As these cases were not called in court, and at the request of the inspector, we withhold the names of those guilty.

EARTHQUAKE.

The Citizens Considerably Startled Sunday Evening

On Sunday night between 10 and 11 the residents of Napanee were startled by an exceedingly loud sharp crack, as though a dynamite explosion had taken place, followed by a rumbling noise. THE EXPRESS was awake at the time and heard it distinctly. We were rather startled to be sure, but looked upon it as a sharp peal of thunder, having experienced similar reports before. We were therefore surprised next morning on being accosted by several with the question "Did you hear the earthquake?" and later on to find that the general belief was that the shock was that of an earthquake. All morning it was considerably discussed. The noise was very loud and lasted only a few seconds. Some give it as ten seconds; others fifteen; some half a minute and others a minute. Not having "kept time" we are not in a position to give the exact duration, but are aware that in less time than it takes to write it it was all over. It made the houses tremble, shook the windows, rattled shutters, etc. No damage was done as far as we have been able to learn.

It appears to have been pretty general in this section, being felt at Belleville, Madoc, Tweed, Tamworth, Enterprise, Camden East, and slightly at Kingston.

First reports stated that goods were thrown from the shelves of a store in Tamworth, but we are unable to secure reliable information regarding such.

In the neighborhood of Bath it was felt, much the same as at Napanee.

At Belleville it shook the windows and rattled the shutters. One who heard it plainly, said it resembled the noise of an omnibus going rapidly over a stone pavement.

The campers at Thompson's Point heard it, the noise resembling that of distant thunder.

Our correspondent at Odessa writes thus regarding the shock there: "At this place the rumbling was as if some buggy had passed rapidly over the iron bridge; that's all."

The shock was slightly felt at Desoronto.

an enjoyable one. The str. Quinte left the wharf here about 9 o'clock with a good load, and returned again at 6.30 p.m, without the least occurrence of any kind happening to mar the day's pleasure. The committee, which we stated last week were appointed to go to Rednerville to complete arrangements for the picnic, upon visiting the place found that it would be preferable to hold the gathering at Massassaga. This was accordingly done, and the 208 scholars put in a most happy day there. Some of the excursionists continued the journey to Belleville, and a few to Rednerville.

—Wednesday afternoon Napanee was visited by the wind storm of the season. About 3 o'clock it blew a perfect hurricane for a time, being closely followed by a very short heavy fall of rain. This cleared off and the elements remained fairly calm until evening, when a regular cyclone set in. Dust blew in every direction, making travel exceedingly unpleasant. The damage reported consisted of breaking trees off, knocking fences down, blowing fruit to the ground in large quantity, and tossing loose articles on the street around in great style. The storm had a decidedly cooling effect upon the atmosphere, the weather Thursday morning being if anything very cold for July.

—Friday afternoon, an old man named Matthew Leonard, residing on the 9th concession of Tyendinaga, went out to fire some stumps. Some time later a neighbor in passing found the fence burning and began to tear it down. While so engaged he heard groans and on looking about discovered Mr. Leonard lying on the ground with his clothing burnt nearly off and his legs and the lower part of his body burnt almost to a cinder. Assistance was at once obtained, but too late, and Leonard shortly after breathed his last. How the accident occurred will never be known, but it is surmised that he fell in a fit, and when his clothing caught fire was unable to help himself and so perished after suffering the most terrible agony.—Belleville Ontario.

—The eighteenth annual report of the Entomological society, of Ontario says: In examining the seeds of the common Canada thistle with a view to finding out the extent of their fertility, an observer was surprised to find that in nearly every head most of the seeds had been destroyed by a white dipterous lava, which was generally placed head downwards, only showing a brown disk with two pores on the upper end. It had a peculiar habit of developing itself with the pappus of the thistle, which was wrapped tightly round it, as though the larva had twisted itself round and round and drawn the silky pappus with it until a thick wad was formed. This is certainly good news. If there exists an insect capable of getting away with Canada thistle, it should certainly be encouraged.

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret, Wyllard's Weird, Etc., Etc.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(Continued.)

Adrian had a good many opportunities for observing his sister-in-law after that evening at Lady Glandore's, and every new meeting only convinced him the more that all was not well with her. St. Austell's shadow followed her like a blight; and yet Adrian had never seen anything in her conduct which would justify him in remonstrating with her, or even in warning her against Lord St. Austell. She could hardly refuse to know her sister's friends, while she was chaperoned by her sister; and St. Austell was an old friend of Major and Mrs. Baddeley's.

He took the opportunity of a tete-a-tete lunch with Valentine at the Junior Carlton, to speak of his married life.

"You are quite happy, Val?" he asked. "Your marriage has realized all your hopes?"

"Well, yes, I suppose it has. I don't know very exactly what my hopes were. I only know that I was desperately in love, and that you were a good fellow to give me the field, and are a still better fellow for forgiving me as you have done."

He stretched his hand across the table to shake hands with his brother, with more feeling than he was wont to exhibit.

"Time has been very good to me, Val. I am heart whole again, and I can think of Helen as my sister, and love her as a sister should be loved. I can never forget that she is the first woman I ever cared for."

"How about the second, Adrian?"

"There is no second yet. I will not say of myself that I shall never love again. Life means mutability, and so long as a man lives he may change. I can't help wishing, Val, that you and Helen were a little less fashionable. I don't like your semi-detached way of living."

"My dear soul, we live as most of our fellow-creatures live," answered Valentine, lightly. "I am not the kind of man to be tied to any woman's apron string, wife or mistress. To stand in door-ways while my wife dances; to sit out plays I am sick of while my wife looks on, or to jog up and down the Row at her side. If Helen and I are to hang together for the rest of our lives we must be free to enjoy ourselves after our own ideas. She has an excellent chaperon, and I am letting her sow her wild oats. She will be tired of gadding about in a season or two."

"And when she is tired of gadding about, is she to sit by the fire—alone?"

"My dear Adrian, don't lecture. Who knows? By that time I may be tired of knocking about London, and may sit by the fire and smoke—or take to books, like you. In the meantime, Helen and I get on capitally."

"Yes, and she gets on capitally with men who are ever so much more attentive to her than you are—men who don't mind looking on when she dances, and don't mind jogging up and down the Row. St. Austell, for instance."

Valentine frowned, and then shrugged his shoulders.

"You don't suppose you can make me jealous?" he said. "I am not that kind of person. My wife may accept as much admiration as she likes from other men. I know her heart is mine.

He smiled, recalling his slave's devotion; plied Helen, hurriedly, with a troubled manner, Adrian thought, not as one whose mind was as ease.

"Your horse has more breed than mine," he said, by way of changing the conversation. "He is a very beautiful creature. Where did Valentine pick him up?"

"He was bought at Tattersall's. It was not Valentine who chose him. It was Mr. Beeching—or Lord St. Austell—I am not sure which of them really bought him. They are both considered good judges."

"No doubt. But Val paid for the horse, of course?"

"Of course," answered Helen, reddening at the question. "Who else should pay for him?"

"He must have given a high figure, I take it?"

"No; the horse was a bargain. When I told him I wanted a horse, Valentine said he would only give sixty guineas—that was all he could afford—and I believe Ravioli was bought for that money—or a little less."

"Then there is something wrong with him, I suppose. I hope he is not a dangerous horse."

"Dangerous! Not in the least. He has perfect manners."

"And he is not a whistler, nor a roarer?"

"Certainly not."

"Then I congratulate you on having secured a wonderful bargain. Anyone would give you credit for riding a three hundred guinea horse. I gave very nearly two hundred for this fellow, and he is not half so handsome as yours. Ah, here comes St. Austell. Was he in your cotillon last night?"

"Yes: he is devoted to the cotillon."

Lord St. Austell met them both with the easiest air. He, too, complained of sleeplessness. "These late parties are killing us," he said. "One loses the capacity for sleep. I shall have to go to a hydropathic in the wilds of Scotland or Ireland for a month or two, just to pull myself together."

"I should hardly have given you credit for being out so early," said Adrian.

"Wouldn't you? Oh, I am better than my reputation, I assure you. I hate the Row when the mob are out, and the band, and the talk, and the nonsense. Good day." He saluted Halen and cantered away, as if he had no other purpose in his ride than healthful exercise, and Adrian and his companion saw no more of him.

They rode up and down for an hour, Adrian trying the paces of his new horse, which behaved in the "new broom" manner of horses that have been nourished in a dealer's yard for a space, to the subjugation of their original sin. After that quiet hour's ride and quiet talk, Adrian escorted his sister-in-law back to her door, where the man from the livery yard was chewing his customery straw; and here they parted.

"My mother and I go back to Devonshire to-morrow morning, Helen. You'll not forget?"

"No, Adrian. Good-bye."

And so they parted. She said not a word about going to see Lady Belfield that afternoon, and Adrian did not ask her. He heard afterwards that she and Mrs. Baddeley were at Ranelagh, dined there, and drove home late in the evening to dress for a ball.

The beautiful Mrs. Belfield was asked everywhere this season, and fresh young though she is her sister," said Lady Belfield, after a long reverie.

"I only hope she is not quite the worst," replied Adrian, laying down the new Quarterly. "I wonder that Valentine does not see the danger of such an association."

"Danger is an alarming word, Adrian."

"I can use no other. The beautiful Mrs. Belfield, the latest fashion in beauty, ought not to be meet everywhere in London without her husband, and with such a woman as Mrs. Baddeley for her chaperon; a woman who prides herself in going everywhere with three or four men in in her train."

"It is all very sad, Adrian."

It was all very sad, and it was sadder that Lady Belfield and her son could do nothing to stop this headlong progress of reckless husband and foolish wife, drifting towards ruin. Constance Belfield felt that it was worse than useless to dwell upon the subject in her conversation with her elder son. She wished on his return home, that all things should be made bright and pleasant to him, and yet her own uneasy fears about that other son weighed upon her spirits and made happiness impossible.

She was surprised and somewhat agitated one morning within a week of her return, at receiving a letter from Helen, hurriedly written, and with unmistakeable signs of agitation.

"You told me there were silence and rest for me at the Abbey, and that you wanted me soon," Helen wrote. "May I go to you at once? I am tired to death of London and the season, and I think sleeplessness would kill me if I were to hold out much longer. Valentine has Goodwood and half a dozen other race meetings coming on, so he really does not want me here, since he can hardly ever be here himself. May I go to you to-morrow, dear mother? I shall not wait for a letter, but shall start by the 11 45 train, unless I receive a telegram to forbid me."

The telegram sent in response to this letter was of loving welcome. "Ask Valentine to come with you if only for a few days," was the last sentence in the message.

Lady Belfield drove to meet her daughter in-law. She stood on the platform as the train from Exeter came slowly into the station, and the first glimpse of Helen's face startled and shocked her. That pale wan look which she had noticed on the morning after the ball, had intensified to an almost ghastly pallor. Helen looked wretchedly ill, and there was an expression of misery in that pallid countenance which was more alarming than any physical decay.

Constance Belfield had too much tact to remark that appalling change as she and Helen clasped hands on the platform, or during the drive to the Abbey. She did not even ask what had brought about the change in the young wife's plans.

"I am very glad to have you here, my dearest," she said, and that was all.

Helen was curiously silent and offered no explanation of her sudden visit. She nestled affectionately against Lady Belfield's shoulder, resting her weary head there, smiling faintly, with a smile that was sadder than tears.

"I feel so much happier here than in London," she said. "I feel so safe with you, mother."

She had hitherto refrained shyly from that familiar name, but in her yesterday's letter and in her talk to-day, the word mother seemed to come naturally from her yearning heart.

"Yes, dear, you are safe with Adrian and me. He has forgotten and forgiven the past, and you are to him as a dear sister."

"That is so good of him. But how poorly he must think of me. Yes, I know he must despise me for the past, and for the foolish, frivolous present, for all my life this

"You don't suppose you can make me jealous?" he said. "I am not that kind of person. My wife may accept as much admiration as she likes from other men. I know her heart is mine.

He smiled, recalling his slave's devotion; her delight at a kind word, her blushing pleasure at a casual kiss. He forgot that those things belonged to his experience of last year. He had not even noticed the growing change in his wife's manner, so completely was he absorbed in himself and his own pleasures.

"Indeed, Valentine, I have never doubted Helen's affection for you; but I think she deserves a little more of your company—a little more of your care. She is too young and too beautiful to stand alone in London society."

"Bosh! A good woman always knows how to take care of herself. It is only bad ones that want looking after."

Adrain was silent. He felt that he had said as much as he could safely say to Valentine; but there was something which he meant to say to Helen before he went back to Devonshire.

He rode in the Row the day before he left London, to try a saddle horse which he had bought at Tattersall's on the previous afternoon. He rode early, and was surprised to meet his sister-in-law coming in at the Kensington Gate, quite alone, as the clocks were striking nine.

"I heard you wer eto be at two dances last night, Helen, so I hardly expected to see you out so early," he said.

"I couldn't sleep," she answered; "so it was just as well to have my ride before the herd came out."

She had flushed suddenly as he rode up to her, but the colour faded as quickly as it came and left her very pale.

"You look as if you wanted sleep, more than an early ride," he said, gravely, shocked at her waxen pallor, but still more at the startled guilty look with which she had recognised him.

"I daresay I do,' she answered, carelessly. "We were dancing the cotillon at five o'clock. I had no idea you rode in the Park."

"I am only here because of my purchase yesterday. How do you like him?"

Helen looked critically at the handsome upstanding bay.

"Very much. He looks every inch a hunter."

"Isn't it a pity that I only want him for a hack! said Adrian, with a touch of bitterness, remembering those days, when his betrothed had lamented his deficiencies as a sportsman. "Never mind, Helen, you can hunt him in the autumn when you come to the Abbey. You will come, of course?'

"I don't know."

"Oh, but you must come, Helen. You must come and stay with my mother, and take your fill of rest, and dulness, and country air, after the whirl and wear of London life. There is nothing in the world so good as perfect rest in a quiet old country house. Valentino will have the shooting in September and October, and you can have plenty of cub-hunting. I will get one of the Miss Treducey's to look after you. They never miss a morning."

And then, bending over her her horse's neck, he said, with gentle earnestness:

"Remember, Helen, the Abbey is your natural home, and my mother your natural protector, second only to your husband. In the hour of doubt or trouble that home ought to be your haven of refuge. Never fear to fly there; never fear to confide in my mother's love."

"You are very good. Lady Belfield is the dearest woman in the world. Of course I shall be charmed to go to the Abbey if Valentine will take me, and I daresay he will like to go there for the shooting," re-noon, and Adrian did not ask her. He heard afterwards that she and Mrs. Baddeley were at Ranelagh, dined there, and drove home late in the evening to dress for a ball.

The beautiful Mrs. Belfield was asked everywhere this season, and fresh young beauty had opened many doors which had hitherto been closed against Mrs. Baddeley.

There was an awkward story about that lady's diamonds, the particulars of which had been only correctly known to a select few, but which the select few had not forgotten, while even the vulgar herd knew there was a story of some kind, not altogether creditable to the wearer of the gems.

CHAPTER XXIV.—"IT CANNOT BE."

Lady Belfield went back to Devonshire dispirited at having seen very little of her younger son during her stay in London, and not altogether satisfied as to the aspect of his domestic affairs. That marriage which was no union, that laborious pursuit of pleasure which husband and wife were carrying on in opposite directions, filled her with anxiety.

Those darker clouds which Adrian has perceived on the horizon had not revealed themselves to the matron's innocent eyes. Her experience of life had not familiarised her with the idea of false wives and deceived husbands. These too had married for love, she knew, casting all other considerations to the winds, in order to belong to each other; and it never occurred to her that such lovers could weary of each other. She saw that they were leading frivolous lives, and living very much apart; she saw many tokens of folly and extravagance on both sides; and she left London full of vague fears for the future. But those fears were only vague, and there was no forecast of sin or ignominy in her mind, when she bade Helen good-bye in the little Japanese drawing-room, just before she drove to Paddington.

It was within an hour of noon, and Helen came out of her bedroom, pale and wan, in her white muslin wrapper.

"You have had a very short night, I fear," said Lady Belfield.

"Oh, I wouldn't mind how short it was if I could only sleep," answered Helen, impatiently. "My nights are always too long. The birds were singing when we came home, and I thought if I could only sleep for a couple of hours I should be as fresh as they were; but I lay awake till the birds changed to the milkman, and the milkman to the postman, and then came the tradesmen's carts."

"You must come to the Abbey, Helen; there will be silence and rest for you in your old rooms."

"Oh, I love those old rooms, though I have had some sad thoughts in them. Yes, Val says he will be delighted to go to you for the pheasant shooting."

"But that is a long time for me to wait. I want youvery soon, Helen. A quarter past eleven. I must go, love, our train starts at a quarter to twelve. Good-bye."

And so they parted with kisses, and not wlthout tears on Helen's part.

The door had scarcely closed when she flung herself on the sofa and buried her face in the cushions to stifle her sobs. Valentine was fast asleep after a late night at the club. He had the happy temperament of the man who can live hard, and slumber after a night of riot as serenely as a ploughman sleeps after his placid labours.

Adrian met his mother at Paddington, and they went down to Devonshire together in the seclusion of a reserved coupe, with books and newspapers, fruit and flowers, and all the things that can make a long journey endurable on a hot summer day.

"I'm afraid Mrs. Baddeley is not quite the best companion Helen could have, al-past, and you are to him as a dear sister."

"That is so good of him. But how poorly he must think of me. Yes, I know he must despise me for the past, and for the foolish, frivolous present, for all my life this last season."

"The season is over now, Helen, with all its frivolities. It is not even worth thinking about."

"No, it is all over now," answered Helen, with a faint sigh. "I don't suppose I have been much worse than other people. I know I have not been half so bad as some women—and yet I hate myself for my folly."

"As long as it has left no sting behind it, dearest, the folly may so easily be forgotten."

"Oh, but there is always a sting, the sting of self-contempt."

"I will not hear you talk of self-contempt. You are coming to the Abbey to be happy, and to get back your roses and lilies. Adrian has a horse that he says will suit you admirably. You will enjoy riding on the moor in the early mornings."

"Adrian is too kind; but I don't care much for riding now."

"Don't you think riding would brace you up after your long spell of late hours and hot rooms? At any rate there will be cub-hunting for you in a month or six weeks, and that you are sure to enjoy.

Helen only answered with a sigh, which sounded like an expression of doubt, and was silent for the rest of the drive, as if too weary for speech.

Adrian was in the porch ready to receive his sister-in-law with a brotherly welcome; and he too was startled at the change for the worse which the last week had made in Helen's appearance. That deterioration gave strength to those fears which had troubled him when he left London.

Helen's rooms were in the southern wing, immediately over the library. There was a large bedroom with a wide Tudor window, and an oriel at the southwestern corner; and there was a spacious dressing-room adjoining, which served also as a boudoir, and was provided with all luxurious appliances for reading and writing, or repose. There was a secondary dressing room on the other side of the bedroom, which Valentine had used on former visits, and where there were still some of his hunting and riding whips in the rack, and some of his hunting gear in the drawers.

The casements were open, and the scent of tea roses and honeysuckle came in with the soft breath of summer winds. The view from that wide old window was of the loveliest, a wooded valley through which the broad full river ran sparkling in the western sun, and across the vale rose the bold dark outline of the moor, like a wall that shut off the outer world.

Helen sat at the broad window seat after Lady Belfield left her, looking out at the oaks and beeches, the thickets of hawthorn and holly, and the river flowing behind them at the foot of the hill, looking and not seeing any of those things which showed themselves with such exceeding loveliness in the golden haze of afternoon. She was seeing another scene, far less fair, yet not unbeautiful. A lawn sloping to the Thames, with fine old trees here and there, and in the background a white lamp-lit house, with classic portico and long French windows. Across the river other lamps, shining in many windows and tall chimneys and dark roofs, and a large barge sailing by upon the moonlit stream; and on the rustic bench beside her, in the shadow of a veteran elm, sits a man whose voice thrills her like music, a man who pleads to her, who dwells with ever intensifying urgency upon his own misery how is to be doomed to live apart from her, if he implores her to pity and to bless his despairing love, to let him be the sharer of her life, the guardian of her happiness, since without her life is intolerable for him. He pleads as poor humanity might plead to the angels. He revers, he honours, her in tenderest phrases, in sweetly flattering speech, while he exercises every art he knows to bring her down to the level of the fallen and the lost among her sex. He blinds and dazzles her by the glitter of artful phrases, by the lurid light of a phantasmagoric vision—the fancy picture of the future they two would live together, once having broken the bondage of conventionality. "Conventionality!" That is the word by which Lord St. Austell defines duty to her husband, respect for the world's laws, and fear of God. Conventionality alone is to be sacrificed.

So he pleads to her, half in moonlight, half in shadow, in that quiet corner of Hurlingham lawn, far away from the bustle and the racket of the club-house and the terrace, where frivolity chatters and saunters in the moonshine.

Here there is no frivolity. Here is deepest purpose. He pleads, and she answers weakly, falteringly. No, again and again no—it cannot be.

But for that night at least he can win no other answer than that despairing refusal. They part after the drive home, on her sister's threshold, where they have driven in a party of four, the inevitable Beeching in attendance upon his liege lady, albeit resentful of ill-treatment. They part in silence, but even the clasp of St. Austell's hand at parting is a prayer, scarcely less insistent than those spoken prayers in the Hurlingham garden.

This was the night before last, and she has not seen him since, and she has sworn to herself that she will never see him again.

What shall she do with her life without him? That is the question which she asks herself despairingly now, in the golden light of afternoon, sitting statue-like, with her hands clasped above her head, leaning against the deep embrasure of the good old window. What is to become of her without love, or mirth, or hope, or expectancy? All things that gave color to her life have vanished with that fatal lover, who came as suddenly into her existence as a rainbow glorifies the horizon.

What the Girls Thought of.

Evelina is engaged. Indeed, she is shortly to be married. Her "set," of whom she is the first to take this important step, are greatly fluttered by the approaching event, and talk it over on every possible occasion.

One of them says it is dreadful for an unknown man to come from away out West and carry off one of their girls. They will never see her again—never! She will come home to visit, probably; but a girl who is married tells "him" everything, and has lost interest in people, and isn't the same at all; and they may as well make up their minds to losing her, once for all.

Here there is a chorus of sighs and groans, and another nice girl says he isn't much to look at, either; she has seen his photograph. He has pale eyes, and a ridiculous little moustache that she knows by his looks he is extremely proud of. Why Evelina wants him, she can't imagine. He isn't handsome, or rich, or heroic, or anything else interesting. He is just a commonplace young man.

Some one here timidly ventures to remark that Evelina is nothing very extraordinary herself, and, perhaps, a commonplace young man will exactly suit her.

Silence follows this observation, and the person who at length breaks it, discreetly

NORTH-WEST INDIANS.

White Wolfers and their Habits—The First Trader—A Visit to an Indian Reserve—An Indian Trade—The Red Man's Eloquence.

To speak of a Canadian republic will seem like the anticipation of history; on the contrary it is, so far as one portion of the North-West is concerned, only the recording of it. These territories one naturally supposes to be a new country in every respect—a country without a history, without monuments, above all without romance. There is, however, a fine chapter of romance to be written about it, although, unfortunately, there are only about half a dozen people living who can write it, and three or four of those have told me that they have no intention of attempting the task. For example, to take one aspect only, the Canadian North West was a lawless republic administered by an irresponsible and self-appointing provisional Government probably never even heard of in England, and yet this state of things existed no longer ago than 1868. At that time the country was inhabited chiefly by Indians, and the principal white industry consisted of the occupation of "Wolfer," the men who shot buffaloes, poisoned their carcasses with strychnine, and collected and sold the skins of the hordes of wolves which they thus destroyed. These "wolfers," a set of men with habits and instincts of the modern cowboy, but infinitely more desperate, formed themselves after a while into a community and organization known as the

a name taken from the Blackfoot word "Speechea," meaning high bluff. They appointed a captain or president who was practically dictator of the whole of the vast extent of country given over to the buffaloes and the red men, and they executed their decrees mercilessly and with impunity. The names of half a dozen of the leaders still echo occasionally around camp fires or drinking saloons. Jack Healy, Jack Evans, Van Hale and Tom Hardwick, who was afterwards lynched by his own crowd. Jack Healy was, perhaps, the most noted of them all, and an authenticated incident of his variegated career will show what the Spitsee Cavalry was and the character of the men with whom it had to deal. At the junction of the Belly and Old Man Rivers there is a place called Whoop Upso, called from the fact that in still earlier days the whole crowd of whites were driven together there for mutual protection against a furious Indian onslaught; or, in other words, whooped up by the war whoops of the savages—and there Jack Healy kept a miscellaneous store for trading. He was the first man who ever sold or bartered with the Indians modern rifles and fixed ammunition. Before this it had been an unwritten but strictly observed custom to sell no fire arms to the red men except old-fashioned flint lock muskets; and Healy's innovation rendered the Indians much more dangerous enemies and proportionally more dangerous and less irresponsible. Many were the protests made to Healy, and many the threats, of all of which he took no notice. The Spitsee Cavalry are all gone now, with two exceptions, one of whom is a respectable member of the Dominion Parliament, while the other keeps a whiskey den at Fort Macleod.

The Indians, in spite of their fixed ammunition and their Winchesters, are not faring much better. On my Sunday in Calgary I was driven out to visit Mrs. Moore turned to Jerry and asked him what the chief was saying. Jerry, however, vouchsafed no reply until Standing Buffalo had seated himself in his blankets again. Then the Colonel turned to him, and said, "Now, Jerry, tell me exactly what he said." "He say he d—— glad," was Jerry's reply, and all that Colonel Macleod ever knew of Standing Buffalo's eloquence. When Lord Lorne was taken once to the Indian Reserve at Fort Qu'Appelle, the Indian address was translated first from Sioux into Cree, from Cree into half-breed French—French patois—and from French into English.

The general management of the Indians in the Dominion is extremely good and reflects great credit on everybody concerned, especially when compared with the misgovernment of the Indian reservations in the United States. The one exception is that of the Metlakahtla Indians in British Columbia which looks discreditable to everybody concerned in it. There are 84 Indian reservations in the North-West, containing 17,000 Indians. These Indians have 8511 acres of land under cultivation. They have 1767 houses, 7637 head of cattle. There are 36 Indian schools and three industrial schools. The calculated average income of each Indian family is sixty-nine dollars, to which is added an average Government aid of $185. These are the figures given by Lietenant-Governor Dewdney at the banquet given to him on his retirement from office, by the citizens of Calgary.

OF THE OLD INDIAN LIFE

little remains and that little is discouraged by the authorities. Of the warpath and the scalping knife are only memories and the tomahawk is no longer ever raised against a white man. The only danger of an outbreak in recent years was when Riel added to his abandoned crimes the absolutely unpardonable one of trying to induce the Indians to take the warpath against the whites; but very few of them responded. The one ceremony which still may be seen occasionally—and even this will be extinct in two or three years is the "Sun Dance"—that is, the ceremony at which the braves are made by torture. Some of the photographers of Calgary have succeeded in photographing this savage ceremony. The pictures show the medicine camp over among the trees, the medicine pole in the centre, the crowd of Indians—men, women and children—gathered around in awe and anticipation, and the unfortunate Indian buck to be made into a brave standing tied to the pole by a leather rope attached to the two ends of a skewer driven through the muscles of each side of his breast. A large tom tom, or medicine drum, is attached in a similar way to a skewer driven through the muscles of his back; and, to an accompaniment of the beating of many drums and frantic yells and whoops of the whole camp, he is supposed to dance, at first quietly, and then with gradually increasing excitement to lash himself into a semi-insane paroxysm, the climax of which is reached when the drum is flung off from his bleeding back, and he releases himself from the pole to fall fainting, but a brave, at its foot, the skewers having been torn out of the solid muscle. The photograhp was taken just at the commencement of the dance, and was only with great difficulty, owing to the buck trembling so much with excitement that it was almost impossible to secure a picture of him at all.

THE CONCLUSION LEFT ON ONE'S MIND

by a few days spent among the Indians is the cynical one that, in spite of all one's convictions about the desirability of philanthropy and good treatment to the disposherself, and, perhaps, a commonplace young man will exactly suit her.

Silence follows this observation, and the person who at length breaks it, discreetly selects another branch of the inexhaustible subject: Does anybody know anything about the trousseau? It appears that they all do, but the information possessed by one exactly agrees with that of no one else, and it is half an hour before they have sifted out the probable truth from a mass of conflicting accounts, all given at once and very loud.

When this most important point has been debated and settled, they take another half hour to express their amusement at the idea of Evelina's actually keeping house; they say it is nearly as absurd as it will be to call her Mrs.

They then discuss the coming ceremony, and each gives at length a description of the manner in which her own wedding should be conducted, were she to marry. Several of the girls say they should like to marry just to show their friends what a wedding ought to be.

One remarks that she, too, would like it, that she might demonstrate to everybody that a bride need not be pale, and can say "I will," loud enough to be heard beyond the first three pews, if she will only make up her mind beforehand to do it.

When Evelina's marriage really takes place, she is very pale, indeed, and too nervous to attend properly to her train.

But her friends forgive her these little errors of conduct, and admit that on the whole she did very well. One of them who steps down to the station, and stands behind a pillar to see her start off with her husband for their new home, even says afterwards that she has almost forgiven her for choosing him.

He looked as commonplace as ever, she declares; only, when two people seem as happy as they did, somehow you have to forgive them everything; and she hopes the other girls will stay single for a long time to come; but as to Mrs. Evelina, she wishes her good luck with all her heart.

This is about the way nice girls behave when one of their numbermakes a commonplace young man happy.

A Humble Apology.

Rev. G. H. Pendleton, of Worcester, Mass., has written a personal letter to President Cleveland apologizing for his "mistake" in talking too freely about what he knew were idle rumours concerning the President's domestic life. He makes in his letter to the President a most humble apology for having been the instrument of disseminating private scandal, and says he regards a man who would do this to be quite capable of any crime. He adds also that upon investigation since the publication of his interview and the articles growing out of it, he has found that he was entirely wrong, and he is now convinced that there is no happier married pair alive than the President and his young wife, and no more virtuous and loving husband in the land to-day than Grover Cleveland.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

Pipes for Anybody.

Citizen (to stranger)—What are your politics, my friend?

Stranger—I have no politics this year; I'm leader of a brass band.

Miss Saratoga—"Is Mr. O. Shaw any relative of yours?" Miss Wauka Shaw—"O yes, he's a distant relative." "How distant?" "He's my brother, but he is the youngest of nine children, and I'm the eldest.

The Indians, in spite of their fixed ammunition and their Winchesters, are not faring much better. On my Sunday in Calgary I was driven out to visit Mrs. Moore at her cattle ranch, and strange enough it was to find in a small prairie home in this far off country Miss Ethel Moore, one of the two young ladies of whose successes at Cambridge, in taking academic honors over the heads of all the men, England had been talking a few months before. Another young ranchman, also an Englishman, had driven over to spend Sunday, and both teams were hitched up together to what is called a "bob-sleigh," a simple square box on runners and covered with hay and rugs; and we were driven across the prairie with this original four horse team, to the Indian Reserve, half a dozen miles away. I have spoken before of the endurance of those horses, and, since then, Colonel Herchmer, the Chief of the Mounted Police, has told me that once, without pressing his horses, and including several idle days, he drove 2405 miles in 50 days with a pair of broncos. In summer the Indians live in their wigwams, but in winter they have warm log huts heated by the modern cast iron stove, and known as "shacks." The reserve and is given up entirely to the Indians who are in charge of the Government Agent and to whom rations of meat and flour are distributed two or three times a week. Leaving the team at the agent's house, and starting across on foot we were immediately met by the usual self-appointed escort of visitors to the Indian lodges, consisting of some fifty dogs, big and little, of the most impossible breeds, but chiefly yellow and all extremely savage. To get along at all it was necessary to place the ladies in the middle and for each man of the party to arm himself with a club and keep a very sharp eye on the curs who prowled at his heels. The Indians themselves are fairly good looking when not disfigured by disease; and, partly by the sale of the articles they make, partly by the liberality of the government, are very well off—so well off, indeed, that it is almost impossible to strike a bargain with them for anything without paying more than two or three times the value of the things one wishes. A French halfbreed acted as our interpreter and, in the shack of the chief, whose name was Bull Head, I tried to buy a buckskin dress elaborately and gorgeously worked with beads. This the chief said was worth a horse, an Indian horse being commonly valued at thirty dollars. After a while he came down to fifteen dollars, at which sum I agreed to purchase it and the interpreter folded it up and took it under his arm. I produced a twenty dollar bill and asked if any of the party had change.

As soon as the Indian family saw the bill they requested the interpreter with a word to hand the dress back and then calmly nodded that and not a cent less would they take after seeing the bill. To hold a conversation with them is almost impossible, for the interpreter is only one degree less laconic than the Indians themselves. A funny story is told to illustrate this. When Colonel Macleod was first negotiating terms of support between the Government and the Indians, he had a long palaver with an Indian chief named Standing Buffalo. The Colonel, through the interpreter, explained briefly the terms he had to offer. Standing Buffalo then arose and addressed him with solemn tones and impassioned oratory and reiterated gestures for nearly twenty minutes. The interpreter, a famous halfbreed named Jerry Potts, stood silently by. Several times during the harangue Colonel Macleod by a few days spent among the Indians is the cynical one that, in spite of all one's convictions about the desirability of philanthropy and good treatment to the dispossessed owners of these boundless lands, the old Indian fighters are not far wrong when they say that there is no good Indian except a dead one. The red man is dirty, idle, brutal in all his instincts, and of any earthly use to the community he never will be, and the sooner he disappears from the face of the earth and leaves behind only the idealized portraits of Marryat and Mayne Reid, the better for everybody concerned. —Henry Norman in Montreal Star.

Married While Dying.

Miss Mary Stauffer, an attractive young woman, 18 years of age, was married the other day to Luke Fisher, at Schuylkill. In less than five minutes after the ceremony had been performed the bride died, surrounded by her weeping husband and family. An hour or two previous she had been walking in a field near the house, and her dress caught fire from a heap of burning brush. She ran screaming, and her cries brought to her aid a party of farm laborers, among them Luke Fisher, to whom she was to have been married next week. There was nothing at hand with which to put out the fire, and Fisher picked her up and carried her to a hogshead of water and plunged her into it. He himself was scorched, and the young woman sustained frightful injuries.

Miss Stauffer was carried into the house, and, though suffering the most excruciating agony, she expressed a wish to be married before she died. The Rev. Mr. Feger was called in and had hardly pronounced the words that made her Mr. Fisher's wife when she became unconscious and soon expired.

A Change of Treatment.

Young Sissy (to Crowley's guardian)—Aw—what do you give Mr. Crowley when he has a cold, aw?

Guardian—When it's not serious, sir, give him flaxseed tea.

Young Sissy—Aw, I don't believe in that sort of treatment, aw—flaxseed tea nevah did me any good.

Guardian—That so? Then I won't give Crowley any more of it.

The elementary stage of knowledge is to make Self, and Self alone, thy study and thy world.

From the yearly reports of the banks it would appear that the business of the country, though not "booming," is yet, as a whole, in a sound, healthy condition. The short crop last year of course made a great difference. The farmers, by the shortage, lost some seven or eight millions of dollars, and their purchasing power was accordingly lessened by that amount. Still, with economy and care the country has been pulling through all right in spite of the infamous failure of two or three banks. Of course, the Central fiasco has afforded all the bank managers a text from which to preach a solemn sermon of warning and reproof. But then the Central, in the long run, may do good. The villainy shown by its managers and wreckers will read a lesson of carefulness and distrust for many years to come, while, if the great sinners connected with it can be brought to justice and sent to pick oakum in the penitentiary they may in some measure, in this way, make reparation for the desolation they have caused. The straightening out of the affairs of that wretched institution more and more reveals a state of scandalism and imbecility that one could scarcely have believed to be possible.

NUTTIE'S FATHER.

BY CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—(CONTINUED.)

Mark's tete-a-tete had been with his sister May, to whom he had much to tell of his wife and her gallant patience and energy, and how curious it was that now the incubus that had weighed on his uncle's household was removed, the prejudice had melted away, and he had grown so fond of her that, next to Ursula, she was his best comforter.

"I hope that will lead to more," said May.

"I don't see how," said Mark. "The more we rely only on a blessing on our own portions the better."

"Even when Annaple works within an inch of his life?"

"Now that she is on a right tack about the baby, that will be easier. Yes, May, I do feel sometimes that I have brought her down to drudgery and narrowness and want of variety such as was never meant for her, but she will never let me think so. She says that it is living in realities, and that it makes her happier than toiling after society, or rather after the world, and I do believe it is true! I'm sure it is with me."

"But such work as yours, Mark."

"Nonsense, May: I enjoy it. I did not when I was in the Greenleaf firm, with an undeveloped sense that Goodenough was not to be trusted, and we were drifting to the bad, yet too green to understand or hinder it; but this I thoroughly like. What does one want but honest effective work, with some power of dealing with and helping those good fellows, the hands, to see the right and help themselves?"

May sighed. "And yet, now that poor child is gone, I feel all the more how hard it is that you should be put out of the rights of your name.

"I never had any rights. It was the bane of my life to be supposed to have them. Nothing but this could have made a man of me."

"And don't you have regrets for your boy?"

"I don't think I have—provided we can give him an education—such as I failed to make proper use of, or Annaple might be luxuriating at Pera at this moment."

"Well!" said May, pausing as she looked up the vista of trees at the great house; "I can't bear it to go out of the old name."

"Names may be taken!"

"You don't mean that there's any chance of——Oh! not that horrid Mr. Fane?"

"Certainly not."

"Oh!" as a trim black figure appeared walking down the open space. "That man!"

"I am not authorised to tell any one so, May."

"Yes, I understand. The wretch, he is taking stock of the place already!"

"For shame, May, no one has deserved so well of them."

"I don't care, he got you into that horrid concern."

"And got me out of it, and found my work for me. I tell you, May, it is the best thing that could possibly happen to your parish, or the estate, or my poor uncle either! And you will soon come to a better mind."

"Never, while he is to get into your place! Turn back before he comes within hailing distance."

Before Mark could do anything towards bringing his sister to a better mind he was seized on by his stepmother to propound a always felt that it was a great pity he should not have the estate he had been brought up to expect. I believe dear mother thought it would have been the right thing for me to marry him, but I always did mean to give it back to him, even when I didn't like him. Well, then, you know it all seemed settled otherwise, but now, it is so lucky you spoke to me while that dear little fellow was with us, because now you will help me to persuade my father that it is the only satisfactory thing to do to let it go in the male line to Mark and his Willy."

"I see! I see!" said Mr. Dutton eagerly. "It would be an infinite relief if it could be carried out."

"I believe my father would like it," said Nuttie. "He cares for the name; and now no one prevents it; he is fond of Mark, and still more of Annaple! And you! Oh, Mr. Dutton, if he will only take it in the right way, I think you will make me able to do what it grieved dear mother to have brought about for my poor father."

"My whole self is yours to aid you," he said. "You know of course that I could not ask you to detach yourself from one to whom you are so necessary. If he will permit us, we will watch over him together as doing her work."

"Thank you," was all Nuttie's lips could utter, though her hand said much more.

And before they reached London they had arranged something of a plan of action for propitiating Mr. Egremont, and bringing the future prospects to be available so as to save Annaple from being worked to death in the meantime.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ANNAPLE'S AMBITION FALLEN.

"Well, how did you get on, Annaple?"

"Oh! very well, poor old man, on the whole, though it made one pity him doubly that he chose to make as if he forgot everything, and you were all gone on a picnic, taking me out for a long drive in the afternoon—where we were least likely to meet any one—that I will say for him."

"Forgetting is not the best for him."

"As if he could forget! But he was very nice and friendly, and put on his best, most courteous self. I think he looks on me rather as a protector from the solemn Mr. Edsall."

"Surely Edsall treats him well. He was excellently recommended. You know I saw his master's daughter."

"Oh! only too well. He takes the management of him as if he were three years old, or a lunatic. He simply will not be offended any more than if he had to do with a baby."

"What should offend him?"

"That Mr. Egremont greatly resents being allowed nothing but by what Edsall calls medical sanction. He is too blind, you know, to venture to pour out anything for himself, and besides, Edsall has all the drugs under lock and key, and is coolness itself about any amount of objurgations, such as I fancy go on sometimes."

"Do you think he will stand it?"

"Who? Your uncle? Yes, I think he will. This man really makes him more comfortable than poor Gregorio did."

"Yes; Nuttie said she was sure that there was neglect, if not bullying flatterly. But he must miss Gregorio terribly. They has been together for at least five-and-twenty or thirty years, and had plenty of gossip together."

"Whereas the present paternal despotism and appalling dignity and gravity will keep him more dependent on his right congeners."

"If they are of the right sort, that's all." ness habits, who would do justice to you after I am gone."

"Father," said Nuttie, trembling with the effort, "I want you to do something better than that. I want you to let Mark take the agency with a view to himself—not me. Let him be as he would have been if he had never hunted us up at Micklethwayte, and put me in his place."

"Eh!" said Mr. Egremont. "It is not entailed—worse luck; if it had been, I should not have been bound to dance attendance at the heels of such an old sinner as the General."

"No, but it ought to go to the heir male, and keep in the old name. Think—there have been Egremonts at Bridgefield for four hundred years.

"Very pretty talk, but how will it be with you, Miss. We shall have Fane, and I don't know how many more, coming after the scent of Bridefield now," he said a heavy sigh, ending with a bitter "Hang them all!"

"And welcome," said Nuttie, answering the thought rather than the words "Father, I wanted to tell you——"

"You don't mean that any one has been after you at such a time as this!" he cried.

"It was before—I mean it was the evening when we were all so glad, before we began to be afraid."

"The umbrella man! By Jove!"

"And now," went on Nuttie, in spite of the explosions, "he would hardly have ventured to go on with it but for this—I mean," as her father gave a little laugh of his unpleasant sort, "he said it would be the greatest possible relief, and make it all right for the property to go to the heir male."

"Hein! You think so, do you? See how it will be when I come to talk to him! A shrewd fellow like that who got out of the Micklethwayte concern just in time. Catch him giving up a place like that, though he may humbug you."

"Then you will see him, father?"

"If you turn him in on me, I can't help it. Bless me! umbrellas everywhere! And here you mean to turn me over to the mercies of that solemn idiot, Edsall. I should have been better off with poor Gregorio."

"No, father; Mr. Dutton would not take me from you. We would both try all we could to make you comfortable."

"Convert the old reprobate? Is that his dodge?"

"Don't father," for the sneering tone returned.

"Come now," he added, in a much more fatherly manner, for her voice had struck him. "You don't mean that a well-looking girl like you, who could have her pick of all the swells in town, can really be smitten with a priggish old retired umbrella-monger like that. Why, he might be your father."

"He has been getting younger ever since I knew him," said Nuttie.

"Well. He plays as good a game of whist as any man in England," muttered Mr. Egremont, leaving his daughter in actual doubt whether he meant this as a recommendation, or as expressing a distrust of him, as one likely to play his cards to the best advantage. She had to remain in doubt, for they overtook Clarence Fane, who came and spoke to them in a very friendly and solicitous manner, and showed himself willing to accept a lift in the carriage. Mr. Egremont, willing to escape from perplexities as well as to endeavour to drive away if possible the oppression of his grief, invited him in, and he had some gossip to impart, which at first seemed to amuse the hearer after this time of seclusion, but the sick and sore heart soon wearied of it, and long before the drive was over, Mr Egre-

Before Mark could do anything towards bringing his sister to a better mind he was seized on by his stepmother to propound a scheme she had hatched, namely that as a mutual benefit, Nurse Poole should be allowed the consolation of bringing her chief comforter, his little daughter, down with her on the visit Mrs. Egremont had invited her to pay at Redcastle. He was very grateful, though doubtful whether Annaple would accept the offer, for she was missing her children's company, though they were only at Springfield House, and she had been with them part of every day. And, sad as this month had been, it had been such a rest from sheer physical toil that she had gained almost as much by it as the little one.

There was a general assembly and coffee-drinking on the verandah,—Mr. Condamine, Blanche, and her two young sisters were all there,—and May had to be duly civil to Mr. Dutton, though he came back with some water-lilies that he had fished out of the lake for Nuttie, and she thought it taking possession. Then the Londoners set forth for the station, and there Mark, having perhaps had a hint from his wife, saw Nuttie and Mr. Dutton safely bestowed by Broadbent in an empty carriage and then discovered a desire to smoke, and left them to themselves.

They had not been alone together for more than a second since the evening of Alwyn's return, and there was a great shyness between them, which lasted till the first station was past without any irruption of newcomers. Nothing had been said but a few comments on the arrangements and the attendants, but probably both were trying to begin to speak, and at last it was Ursula who crossed over so that her face could not be seen, and said in an odd tone—

"Mr. Dutton———"

"Yes," and he turned instantly on the alert.

"Did you mean it—what I thought you meant that evening?"

"Can you doubt it?" he said earnestly. "But even then I was surprised into the avowal, and I would have held it back if possible, if I had guessed what was going to happen."

"Ah! but then I should not have had that drop of comfort through it all," and she laid hold of his hand, which returned the pressure strongly, but he sedulously guarded both words and tone as he said:

"Listen, Ursula, before you speak again. How dear you must always be to me, I cannot tell you, but when I then spoke, it was with the sense that on every account, I should meet with strong opposition from your father and family. And now your position is altered, so that the unsuitability is doubled. I am not a young man, remember, and my thoughts must be for you above all, I want you to consider whether, in the present state of affairs, you would not do better to look on what then passed as unsaid, or only as the ebullition of gratitude towards your old friend. Let me go abroad, and give you full opportunity for—for some fresh beginning likely to be fitter for you———"

"Mr. Dutton, how can you say such horrid things? As if a dukedom would make any difference."

"Yes," he said, turning towards her. "If it is only the old-friend feeling, then it is better dropped, but if your heart is in it, child, then we go on, come what may. It is due to you."

She raised her face towards him now, and he gave a grave kiss to her forehead. She drew a long breath, and said after a little pause, "And now I have something to say. One does think of such things even in these sad times, and you can help me. I am so glad it is you, because I know you will, and be rejoiced to do so. You know when Mark found us out first, dear mother and I and appalling dignity and gravity will keep him more dependent on his right congeners."

"If they are of the right sort, that's all."

"He has been making me read him a whole heap of letters; indeed, as you know, I have been doing that all along, when he could not get Nuttie. There were some from Mr. Bulfinch. Do you know that bailiff of his must be next door to a swindler?"

"Bulfinch is coming up to see him tomorrow."

"And, Mark, do you know, he has been putting out feelers as if to discover whether we would do—what he asked us to do five years ago."

"Would you?"

"If it were not for the children, and—and sometimes the extreme pinch, I should say it was more like life to work yourself up as a City man," said Annaple. "If you were the Squire, with all his opportunities, it would be a different thing, but there's no outlet there, and I have often admired the wisdom of the Apocryphal saying, "Make not thy self an underling to a foolish man."

"Well, it is lucky you think so, Nannie, for though Dutton is certainly not a foolish man, he will not want an underling. And what do you say to my mother's proposal of having poor Poole to stay at Redcastle, and borrowing baby to comfort her till she goes out again,

"I hate it," said Annaple energetically. "It is very horrid, but is awfully good of the Canoness; and I suppose we will have to let it come to pass, and miss all that most charming time of babyhood which is coming. But most likely it will quite set the little woman up, and be a real kindness to poor Poole."

"If we could only keep her for good."

"Yes, and then our children would not be half so much our own. I do not want to be away with them in our own quarters. I wonder when Nuttie can spare us, but I should like to see her through the great crisis with her father."

That crisis was to involve more than Annaple in the least expected. Nuttie found that the momentous confession could not possibly take place before the interview with Mr. Bulfinch, at which her presence was needed to help her father with his papers. The principal concern was to show the full enormity of the bailiff, and decide upon the steps to be taken, the solicitor being anxious for a prosecution, while a certain tenderness for poor Gregorio's memory, or perhaps for the exposure of his own carelessness, made Mr. Egremont reluctant. There was also a proposal, brought forward with much diffidence from Mr. Condamine's mother, to rent Bridgefield House, but on this, as well as respecting a successor to the bailiff, Mr. Egremont was to give his answer the next day, when Mr. Bulfinch would call again.

Nuttie was thankful for the business that had filled up the hour after luncheon, when Alwyn used to play in the drawing-room and delight his father; but she was feeling desperate to have the crisis over, and resolved to speak when she went out driving with him. It was he, however, who began. "I sonnded Mark's wife yesterday, Ursula. She is a nice little thing enough, and a good wife in her way."

"A very good wife."

"Except when she persuaded him to turn up his nose at the agency. D'ye think he would take it now, since he has tasted the sweets of his umbrella business?" then, as Nuttie paused, taken by surprise; "Five hundred a year and the Home Farm would be better than, what is it, a hundred and fifty and a floor over a warehouse! I don't like to see old Will's son wearing himself out there, and the lad is a good honest lad, with business habits, and he'll be a better manager after this time of seclusion, but the sick and sore heart soon wearied of it, and long before the drive was over, Mr Egremont was as much bored as his daughter had been from the first.

When Mr. Fane got out, he paused a moment to hold Ursula's hand in a tender manner, while he told her that he had not ventured to intrude (he had left a card of inquiry every day); but that if ever he could be of the least use in amusing Mr. Egremont, he was at her service, and would give up any engagement.

"Hein! my fine fellow! No doubt you would!" said Mr. Egremont, when his daughter had uttered her cold thanks, and they had driven on. "I see your little game, but it is soon to begin it. We may as well let them know that she is booked before the running begins."

It was a remarkable intimation of his acceptance of her engagement, but Ursula was contented to take it as such, and be thankful.

Mr. Dutton had his interview as soon as Mr. Egremont had rested after his drive, and the result was satisfactory.

No doubt much was due to the Egremont indolence and want of energy, which always preferred to let things take their course. And now that Gregorio was no longer present to amuse, and take all trouble off his hands, Mr. Egremont could hardly have borne to part with his daughter; and, despite of umbrellas and religion, was not sorry to have a perfectly trustworthy son in-law in the house, able to play at cards with him, manage his household, and obviate all trouble about suitors for the heiress. Moreover, his better feelings were stirred by gratitude on his poor little son's account, and he knew very well that a more brilliant match for his daughter would not have secured for his old age the care and attention he could rely upon here. He was obliged likewise to believe in the disinterestedness, which disclaimed all desire for the estate, as involving cares and duties for which there had been no training; and he was actually glad to keep the property in the direct line. The old liking for Mark, and sense of the hardship of his exclusion, revived, strengthened now by regard for Annaple; together with the present relief from care obtained by making him manager of the estate.

When once brought to a point, Mr. Egremont was always sudden and impetuous, chiefly for the sake of having it over and being unmolested and at rest again. So that very evening, while Nuttie only ventured on sharing with Annaple the glad tidings that Mr. Dutton was accepted, and in his marvellous goodness, undertook to make his omen with her father, Mark was almost stunned by the news, confirmed to him by Mr. Dutton as well as his uncle, that he was to be acknowledged as heir of Bridgefield Egremont, and in the meantime manage the estate with an income suitable to an eldest son.

Presently he came upstairs by himself, and beckoned to Nuttie, rather to the alarm of his wife.

"Ursula," he said, and took both her hands, "I cannot have you do this for me."

"Can't you, Mark? You can't prevent it, you see. And don't you know it is the beginning of all my happiness?"

"But indeed, I cannot feel it right. It is a strained sense of justice. Come and tell her so, Nannie."

"What?" said Annapple coming forward.

They paused a moment, then Nuttie said:

"Only that the estate ought to go into the male line."

"Oh, is that all?" said Annaple, I was afraid Mr. Egremont had a fit!"

"Ah. Don't you see what it means," said Mark. "They want it to be as if there were an entail—to begin treating me as an eldest son at once. It is Ursula's doing, putting herself out of the succession."

"I always hated being an heiress," said Nuttie. "It would be more dreadful than ever now. Annaple, do be sensible! Don't you see it is the only right thing to do?"

"Billy!" was the one word Annaple said.

"Yes, Billy and Jenny and all," said Nuttie, "before you've all died of your horrid place. Oh you haven't heard that part of it. Of course Mark will have to go down to Bridgefield and look after the place, and live like a gentleman."

"Eight hundred a year," murmured Mark, "and the house at the Home Farm."

"Oh! dear," gasped Annaple, "I wanted you to be Lord Mayor, and now you'll only be a stupid old country squire. No, no, Nuttie, it's—it's—it's the sort of thing that one only laughs at because otherwise one would have to do the other thing."

And she gripped Nuttie tight round the waist, and laid her head on her shoulder, shaking with a few little sobs, which might be one thing or the other.

"It will save her youth, perhaps her life," whispered Mark, lifting Nuttie's hand to his lips for a moment, and then vanishing, while Annaple recovered enough to say, "I'm tougher than that, sir. But little Jenny! Oh, Nuttie, I believe it has come in time. I've known all along that one straw more might break the camel's back. We've been very happy, but I am glad it is over before Mark got worn down before his time. Grinding is very wholesome, but one may have too much; and I haven't Mark's scruples, Nuttie dear, for I do think the place is more in his line than yours or Mr. Dutton's."

"Yes," said Ursula, "you see he was always happy there, and I never was.

The next thing was for Mr. Dutton and Ursula to keep Mr. Egremont up to the point of making his long deferred will; nor did they find this so difficult as they expected, for having once made up his mind, he wished to have the matter concluded, and he gave his instructions to Bulfinch the next day. Of course Mark had to give full notice to his employers; but the allowance was to begin at once, so that Annaple only went back to the warehouse to pack up, since she was to occupy No. 5, while Mr. Egremont and his daughter were going under Mr Dutton's escort to the Baths in Dauphine, an entirely new resort, free from the associations he dreaded, for he could not yet bear the sight of little Willy—the rival "boy of Egremont." But the will was safely signed before he went, to the great relief of Nuttie, who, according to the experience of fiction, could hardly believe his life safe till what she called justice had been done.

After all Mr. Egremont became so dependent on Mr. Dutton, during this journey, that he did not like the separation at its close, and pressed on the marriage even sooner than either of the lovers felt quite reverent towards the recent sorrow. He insisted on Bulfinch having the settlements ready for them on their return, and only let them wait long enough to keep their residence, before there was a very quiet wedding in their parish church, with the cousins for bridesmaids. Then Mark and Annaple took care of Mr. Egremont for the fortnight while Mr. Dutton showed his wife his old haunts in France, returning to Springfield House, where there was plenty of room for Mr. Egrement to make his home with them.

Said Annaple to Miss Nugent, "I never saw Nuttie so youthful and bright. She is more like a girl than I ever saw her since the first."

"Yes," said Mary, "she has some one to rest on now."

HEALTH.

How to Keep Well in Summer.

The title of this communication might lead some persons to suppose that it is a more difficult matter to keep healthy in summer than in any other season of the year. It is, however, by no means an established fact that summer possesses a pre-eminence in increasing the disease or mortality records so far as the country at large is concerned. It is true that owing to the vicious methods of living that prevail among certain classes of the inhabitants of the larger cities, the disease and death rate is woefully augmented, but this is more than compensated for, in the rural districts at least, by the opportunity given by warm weather for living the greater part of the day in the open air, and it must not be forgotten that very cold weather makes sad havoc among those who have reached old age or are subjected to other debilitating causes.

It is not to be questioned, however, that there exist in the summer certain inherent peculiarities which predispose to disease, and which are in a great measure avoidable, and to these I propose to direct the attention of the reader.

Excessive heat causes gastric and intestinal diseases, and especially a peculiar disorder known as heat fever or sunstroke. To lessen the liability to the first group mentioned, some attention to the food taken into the system is necessary, and it is especially requisite to avoid vegetables or fruits that are not fully ripe. There is scarcely a vegetable grown in our climate and which is used as food which is not wholesome if eaten in season, not in a semi-decomposed state, and properly prepared for the table. A like statement is applicable to fruits, from the strawberry, which is the first to appear, to peaches, pears and apples, which come later in the season. But when they are brought from a distance, having been picked when still green, and after their arrival frequently been kept by the dealers until they are more or less rotten, they cannot be considered suitable articles of food. Children are especially liable to suffer from eating such substances. Their digestive systems are exceedingly delicate and their nervous systems are very impressionable. Frequently the groundwork for serious organic disease, from which recovery is scarce y possible, is laid in childhood through the neglect of parents to properly supervise the food of their children during the summer season. I have witnessed many cases of epilepsy which have been caused by green berries and other fruit, especially apples, that have been eaten in childhood.

Heat-fever does not necessarily result from direct exposure to to the rays of the sun. It may be caused by the diffused heat endured by a person while under the shelter of his own house. In these latter cases there has usually been some long continued exhausting disease or some untoward mental disturbance has occurred, or the patient has been indulging in excessive physical exertion.

TAKING PROPER PRECAUTIONS.

The persons who suffer from heat-fever through the action of the direct rays of the sun are generally those whose modes of life have been in some respects vicious, or whose sanitary surroundings are bad. Sunstroke rarely occurs to those who take proper care of themselves, even when they are fully exposed to the direct rays of the sun. The victims are generally those who drink alcoholic liquors to excess or who have overloaded the stomach with improper food. Still, cases of sunstroke do occur when the mode of life has not been at variance with the laws of health. It is, therefore, well for everyone to take proper pre-safe, simple herb tea quiets, soothes, and induces sleep when bromide and morphine have for him failed to do so." Many who are addicted to old-time methods and medicines, and others who have accidentally learned the virtues of this particular herb, will quite agree with the above estimate of it. The dried herb can be obtained at any drug store.

WARM MILK STIMULANT.

According to the Medical Record, milk heated to much above 100 deg. Fahrenheit losses for a time a degree of its sweetness and density. It is affirmed that no one who, fatigued by over-exertion of body and mind, has ever experienced the reviving influence of a tumbler of this beverage heated as hot as it can be sipped, will willingly forego it because of its being somewhat less acceptable to the palate. The promptness with which its cordial influence is felt is indeed surprising. Some portion of it seems to be digested and appropriated almost immediately, and many who now fancy they need alcoholic stimulants when exhausted by fatigue, will find in this simple draught an equivalent that will be abundantly satisfying and far more enduring in its effects.

COTTON WOOL IN THE EARS.

A Berlin physician advises that only during extreme cold, or stormy or rainy weather should cotton wool be inserted into children's ears; under ordinary conditions the healthy ear does not need to be protected. This precaution must be taken in the case of every ear predisposed to inflammation. All persons whose membranæ are perforated ought to protect their ears with cotton wool. The entrance of cold fluids into any ear must always be prevented; and so, while bathing or diving, the ear ought to be plugged. Patients with perforations of the membranæ should be very careful in this respect, as violent inflammation may be caused by the entrance of cold water.

SHAKE UP THE INTERNAL MECHANISM.

It is a good rule, says an intelligent physician, always to ride up in an elevator, and when coming down to take the stairs. Like going up hill, walking up stairs is hard work and sometimes risky, especially for people with weak lungs, defective respiratory organs, or heart disease. But going down stairs hurts nobody, but is good exercise; going down on a brisk run is a good thing—it shakes up the anatomy without incurring the danger of physical over-exertion. This shaking up is good for one's internal mechanism, which it accelerates, especially the liver, the kidneys, and the blood circulation.

Advice as to a Headache.

A teacher in Tennessee, who has long suffered from headache, and has tried physicians and remedies with only temporary relief, asks our advice—as to diet and manner of living. He has a good appetite and is otherwise apparently well.

We many presume that a headache may be due to one of many causes, or to several causes acting together. A remedy suited to one case may be harmful in another. Nor can any case be cured without the removal of the cause.

Without some knowledge of the habits, the temperament, the physical tendencies and the general surroundings of the sufferer, it is impossible to mark out any any scheme of diet adapted to a particular case.

But any one who is an intelligent observer of himself and is possessed of a strong will, can, probably, treat himself as successfully as any ordinary physician can treat him.

We will address our correspondent directly, but the advice, with the necessary modifications, will do for others:

Said Annaple to Miss Nugent, "I never saw Nuttie so youthful and bright. She is more like a girl than I ever saw her since the first."

"Yes," said Mary, "she has some one to rest on now."

Mr. Egremont lived between three and four years, more contented and peaceful than he had ever been, though frequently suffering, and sometimes giving way to temper and impatience. But Mr. Dutton understood how to manage on these occasions, and without giving up his own extensive usefulness, could give him such care, attention, and amusement as beguiled his discomforts, and made his daughter's task an easier one.

How far the sluggish, enfeebled nature was capable of a touch of better things, or whether his low spirits were repentance, no one could judge. At any rate sneers had ended, and when he was laid beside his wife and boy at Bridgefield, Ursula stood by the grave with a far more tender and hopeful feeling than she could have thought possible when he had rent her away from her old home. She looked up at her husband and said, "Is not her work done?"

[THE END.]

A Woman of a Sensible Turn of mind.

"You never catch me locking up my valuables when I go to bed," said an intelligent lady a few days ago in discussing a burglary, an account of which she had just been reading. "Whether in a hotel or in my own sleeping room I look for the most conspicious place in the room and there place my purse and all my jewelry, I heap it up so that it will at once attract the eye of any plunderer who may come while I am asleep. What I want of a burglar, if he breaks into my house, is to load himself with booty as expeditiously and as quietly as possible and depart. I don't want to be awakened by his voice and frozen stiff with fright. I don't even want to open my eyes and find them looking into the muzzle of a revolver. I never want to he "Your money or your life." I'd rather give up every dollar I have in the world than hear that expression.'

Let it be borne in mind that the cords of love which bind hearts so closely together that neither life nor death nor time nor eternity can sever them are woven of threads no bigger than a spider's web.—[George S. Hillard.

If happiness has not her seat
And centre in the breast,
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest.

—[Robert Burns.

The advance made in England in the matter of Primary Schools since Mr. Foster's great educational measure came into operation in 1871, is marvellous. The accommodation in elementary schools in England and Wales in '71 was for about 2,000,000 children. Two years ago that accommodation had risen to 5,145,000 or 155 per cent. The average attendance during the same period had risen from 1,231,000 to 3,438,000 or an increase of 2.80 per cent. The lives of the people, and especially of the poorer classes, has, as the result, been made happier, less monotonous, more varied, and fuller of interest. Intemperance, too, has greatly diminished, and official statistics show that there has been a great falling off in crime, not only in the more serious forms, but in the lighter classes of offence. This surely is a very encouraging state of things and it gives promise of better things to be accomplished in the future than have as yet been either thought of or attempted.

drink alcoholic liquors to excess or who have overloaded the stomach with improper food. Still, cases of sunstroke do occur when the mode of life has not been at variance with the laws of health. It is, therefore, well for everyone to take proper precautions against all risks. The clothing should be light, and that worn next the body should be of some material capable of readily absorbing the perspiration. Wool is probably to be preferred, and it should be pure—that is, unmixed with cotton. For the head during very warm weather nothing is better than a straw hat, for not only is it of light weight, but, if properly made, free passage of air round the head takes place. The so-called Panama hats, which are so closely woven that they will hold water, are the worst possible coverings for the head in summer.

It is a remarkable fact that sunstrokes are very seldom met with among persons who expose themselves to the full heat of the sun in the country or outside of the limits of large cities.

It would seem, therefore, that one of the best ways to avoid this disaster is to get out into the country as soon as the very hot weather makes its appearance.

WHERE TO REST.

Where to go would seem to be the next consideration. This is a question in regard to which no very definite rules can be laid down. It may be said in general terms that people who reside on the seashore or its vicinity should, at the approach of hot weather, go into the interior, and that those that live far from the ocean should come to some place where they can get sea air. There are exceptions to this rule, and, after all, experience is our only guide.

Of course a large book could be written on the subject of "How to Keep Healthy in Summer." There is scarcely a point in the whole science of hygiene that could not properly be considered, but I have said enough to do some good to those who may be in want of information as to how they should live during the summer, and I have only to say in conclusion that if they keep cool both in mind and body, get a sufficient supply of pure and changed air, attend to the digestive organs by avoiding improper food, bathe frequently in cool water, drink nothing in the way of alcoholic liquors and take moderate open-air exercise they will place themselves in the best condition for living comfortably not only through this summer, but for many other summers yet to come.—[Dr. Hammond.

Old and New Cures.

For sleeplessness, restlessness, and nervousness in general, physicians usually prescribe bromide, chloral, laudanum, or morphine, whichever they happen to favour most. A correspondent of Good Housekeeping reminds us, however, of an old-fashioned herb—scutelaria, or skullcap—that is "safer than bromide or opium, brings to the sufferer none of the ill effects that are sure to result from a continued use of either of these drugs, and is often a more powerful quietus of diseased nerves and an over-active brain." "Years ago," she says, "when one of a household fell sick and became wakeful and nervous, our grandmothers would steep a generous handful of the skullcap herb, and the patient was made to drink freely of the infusion, which often quieted the tortured brain and nerves. I have given this tea to little nervous, restless babies, who twitched and started in their sleep as though convulsions threatened, and it soon quieted the little patients. I have seen skullcap tea prescribed for a diseased old person, who often declares he is nothing but a bundle of nerves, and this of himself and is possessed of a strong will, can, probably, treat himself as successfully as any ordinary physician can treat him.

We will address our correspondent directly, but the advice, with the necessary modifications, will do for others:

1. You are aware that vigorous out-door exercise is essential to sound health in all persons, and especially so in the case of a brain-worker, under the peculiar strain of a school-room. You need, at the minimum, two hours a day of such exercise. Perhaps with your Southern habits and conveniences, horse-back riding might profitably interchange with rapid, cheery walking.

2. You are equally aware that at least eight hours of solid sleep are still more essential—sleep in a well-ventilated, sun-disinfected room.

3. You may not be aware, but it is true, that "biliousness and indigestion are generally due far more to over-eating or under-eating than to the kinds of food eaten. See if you can trace a connection between the quantity of your food and your distressing symptoms. Lessen it below average of the past, and note whether the tendency to headache lessens with it. If it does, you are on the right track. If not, try the effect of more frequent and abundant meals.

4. Constipation fills the blood with poisons that affect the brain. Let this be remedied, if possible, by your food. Abjure white bread, and use bread made from "entire wheat flour," or much from oatmeal or "wheat germ meal," with a free addition of fruit.

5. Notice whether any particular article of food positively disagrees with you—in itself, and the mode of cooking it, or in the quantity eaten—and govern yourself accordingly.

Make trial of these suggestions for three months and note the result.

Milk For Supper.

Mother-wit is never out of place, but is especially valuable in camp, where men are thrown largely upon their own resources. The historian of a Maine regiment furnishes a striking illustration.

In company L was an old soldier—a graduate from the English Army—and a good soldier. Almost everybody in the regiment knew him, from a peculiar habit he had of putting his hat into his bosom and going into battle bareheaded.

One afternoon he came into camp bringing a very small calf, too small, almost, to walk, certainly too young to be of use for food. There was a general expression of disapprobation, and he was greeted with cries of "Shame!" "Steal a calf like that!" "What in the world are you going to do with it?" but he paid no attention to all this, but marched along, like a man who knew what he was about.

He fastened the calf close by his tent, where its bleatings were piteous to hear.

It was not long before the men saw through the scheme, for the cow, attracted by the cries of her offspring, came to its rescue, whereupon the soldier caught and milked her, and then let her and the calf go off happy. Some of those who had cried shame upon the man no doubt envied him his good supper of hardtack and milk.

"How to Treat Inebriates" is the title a book recently published. But inebriate are just the kind of beings who ought neve to be treated.

The military commander of Moscow has directed that special attention be paid during the summer to cavalry manœuvers, principally in the shape of forced marches of large bodies over long distances.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, JULY 13, 1888,

—Notwithstanding that the authorities at Ottawa have, according to their own professions, the authority to regulate matters in general—sugar in particular—the price of sugar has gone up from 7.50 per hundred on June 8th to $8 per hundred on July 12th. This week it has made two jumps, with still an upward tendency.

—Manitoba has declared very forcibly that of Tory rule she has had enough. A week ago nominations for the Provincial elections were held, when ten Liberals were elected by acclamation. Yesterday the elections took place and resulted in a most crushing defeat for the Macdonald-Norquay-Harrison party. As far as heard from there were but four Tories elected in the whole Province. In Winnipeg city, which has hitherto been looked upon as the stronghold of Torvism, two of the conservative candidates are likely to lose their deposits.

—The national debt of the United States was reduced by $14,429,502 during the month of June, and for the fiscal year the total reduction was $113,844,080. Notwithstanding the purchase of outstanding bonds at a premium by the government, with the view of working off the extra revenues, the surplus in the treasury continues to grow. The total interest bearing debt of the United States is now $1,021,692,350, upon which the yearly interest is $41,780,529. The debt per head of population has decreased from $67.10 in 1868 to $19.58 in 1888, and the interest charge per head has fallen from $3.48 to seventy cents during the twenty years. In the same period the Dominion's debt (estimating the population of Canada at 3,500,000 in 1868 and 4,800,000 in 1888) has increased from $27.54 to $57 per head, while the annual interest charge has increased from $1.28 to $2.11 per head. Thus while the Americans have been reducing their national burdens, Canada has been doing something very different. The United States government have now $482,433,917 in the national treasury for which they have no use, and the amount is constantly increasing. What must be said of the policy which seeks to prevent Canada from trading on equal terms with such a wealthy and prosperous neighbor? What would be said of the merchant who placed obstructions in the way of trading with the wealthiest people in his neighborhood?

AT HYMEN'S ALTAR.

JOY—WALTERS.

On Saturday last one of those events which cause two hearts to beat as one, occurred at the residence of Mr, James Walters, Graham st., when his eldest daughter was married to Mr. Joseph W. Joy, second son of Wilder Joy, Esq. The knot was tied by Archdeacon Bedford-Jones, before a number of friends of the young couple. The ceremony over, the company sat down to a sumptuous repast, after which the newly-married couple were accompanied to the G. T. R station, where they took the midnight-train for Kingston amid showers of rice and old boots. At the latter city they took boat for Montreal and other eastern points. They are expected to return in about a week. The bride was the recipient of a number of valuable presents. Mr. and Mrs. Joy have the well wishes of a large circle of friends for long life and happinees.

HUBBS—KAYLER.

On Thursday evening of last week a very pleasant evening was spent at the residence of F. Kayler, Esq., the occasion being the marriage of his eldest daughter, Susie, to R. H. Hubbs, of Belleville. The bride was charmingly attired in white silk with veil and flowers. Miss Minnie Kayler, of Chicago, who had just returned from Europe, acted as bridesmaid, while the groom was ably supported by W. Campbell, of Belleville. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. J. A. Jewell, of Bloomfield, former pastor of Morven, in the presence of a number of relatives and most intimate friends. The bride was the recipient of many beautiful presents, accompanied by the well wishes of the donors. The happy couple left on the morning train for the west.

STEVENS—ASHLEY.

On Wednesday last, another of these pleasing events took place, when Mr. George Stevens, of Peterboro, son of our townsman, Mr. Chas. Stevens, was married to Miss Maggie Ashley. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Rice, at the home of the bride's father, Mr. Wm. Ashley, in West Huntington, a number of friends being witnesses. The bride was a favorite in the community, as was evinced by the many handsome presents given her. We wish George and his bride every happiness and the best of prosperity through life.

FLYNN—MURPHY.

On Monday, June 25th, Stoco church was the centre of attraction, it being known that at 11 o'clock Mr. Jas. Flynn, of Camden, was to be married to Miss Margaret Murphy, of Stoco, and that the ceremony was to be performed at the above place. The bride was neatly attired in golden satin trimmed with orange ribbons, bonnet and gloves of white, and looked charming. Miss Mary Murphy and Miss Mary A. Flynn were the bridesmaids, and all looked so neat and pretty that they fully shared the honors with the bride. The groom was attended by Mr. John Flynn and Mr. T. Kearns. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Father Fleming. After partaking of the wedding dejeuner at the residence of the bride's father, the rest of the evening was spent by the large assembly of invited guests in tripping the light fantastic. To say that the presents received by the bride were both numerous and costly would be to but faintly describe them. The whole community join in extending their hearty congratulations and best wishes to the happy couple.

At the recent Republican meeting in Chicago, among other planks adopted was one which virtually gives the Union free whiskey. It was seen that this was a mistake and at the last moment the party attempted to patch it up. But the wool was not to be pulled over the eyes of the temperance men in such a manner, as will be seen by the following from Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, the prohibition candidate for president, who says he has received as high as a thousand letters daily since the Republican convention containing assurances of support. The general says: "The little sickly annex, called the Temperance plank, which the Republicans nailed to their platform, has drawn thousands of Temperance votes into the Prohibition ranks. It reminds me of that character in one of Dicken's novels—I can't recall it at this moment—who was so thin his vest buttons could be seen from behind."

During the annual meet of the Canadian wheelmen's association, at Belleville, the hotels were thrown open to visitors, who were treated in a royal manner. A prominent temperance lady protested against this, as it occurred on Sunday, and a dozen or more hotels have been fined for a violation of the Ontario license act.

The Belleville Ontario says: Highway robberies are said to be a common occurrence on our streets after dark. Rowdyism is rampant and peaceable citizens are held up and robbed in a manner which should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of those who love to perpetvate the fair name of the city of the bay. One day last week a respectable merchant was knocked down and robbed of his pocket-book and money. Again on Monday a well-known mariner was fleeced of nearly $100 while enjoying the Dominion day festivities.

The many friends in America, of the late Mr. David Kennedy, who, with his talented family, delighted his countrymen in all lands by his gift of Scottish song, may be interested to know that a massive stone has been erected over the grave in the Grange Cemetery, Edinburgh, a little to east of the resting place of Dr. Guthrie. The stone bears the following inscription:—"David Kennedy, the Scottish Singer, Born at Perth, 15th April, 1825; died at Stratford, Canada, 13th October, 1886."

"We'll meet and aye be fain

—The Globe says: One of the questions that is likely to come up for consideration at the approaching meeting of the Canadian Press Association is that of deadhead advertising. There are a lot of people in every community going about with reputations for benevolence and public spiritedness that really belong to the editors of the local newspapers. They keep themselves before the public by their peculiar capacity for advertising gratuitously themselves and the institutions and movements with which they are connected. They are of the Order of Peanut Philanthropists. Some of the brighest specimens of this remarkable grade of being profess a complete want of faith in the efficacy of advertising, and are rather disposed to regard the press as a means of mischief. If it has a use it is to provide a living for the institutions on which they subsist. The more inferior members of the order are merely thoughtless people who want to be busy at low rates, and do not reflect that it is not the special object of the press to beep them before the public. Perhaps upon the whole there is more want of thought than calculated selfseeking in this practice of deadhead advertising, but it is a fraud on the press—a costly one at that—and it ought to be resisted by newspaper publishers and condemned by the Press Association.

FARMERS, ATTENTION!

INVESTIGATE THE MERITS —OF—

RUSSELL'S IMPROVED FENCE

(PATENTED 1883)

IT RECOMMENDS ITSELF BY ITS SIMPLICITY, CHEAPNESS AND DURABILITY

WHY IT IS THE BEST

It only requires one-half the timber; takes up but half the room of the common rail fence; will not blow down any easier than your buildings. Stock cannot rub or throw it down. No stakes or posts in the ground to decay. It is better than the old-fashioned rail fence. It is far ahead of board fence; it is stronger and can be built for less than half the cost. It is far cheaper than wire fence, with none of its dangers, as wire fencing has ruined more stock in the short time it has been in use than all other fences. Any ordinary old rail fence contains enough material, with the addition of a couple of stakes to each length and one pound of wire, to make a good substantial fence. The wire for this fence costs about three cents per pound. The expense of building and repairing fences exceed all other taxes combined. There is enough material in an eight rail fence to make two good Russell fences, which will be more durable and better looking. Russell's Improved Fence excels all other fences introduced to the notice of farmers, and is endorsed and strongly recommended by the best farmers and stockmen. It is rapidly coming into general use in the United States and Canada wherever introduced.

Farm Rights for Russell's Improved Fence, 5 cents per acre. You furnish the material and we will find the wire and build your fence for 15 cents per rod. For farm and township rights in Lennox and Addington counties apply to Morven.

Mrs (Rev) Peake, who has been quite ill, is slowly improving.

Mrs. J. C. Perry and Mrs. W. Ferguson, of West Philadelphia, are spending the summer with their numerous friends here.

Mr. G. D. Grant, our esteemed school teacher, received the sad intelligence of the death of his father who resides in the Northwest. He was kicked by a horse and almost immediately died.

Mr. and Mrs. Mabey Van Fleet, of Riverside, Cal., are guests at Mr. W. R. Gordanier's. Mr. Van Fleet returns to his southern home next week, but Mrs. Van Fleet and children will spend the summer and fall with her sister, Mrs. W. R. Gordanier.

We have reason to be quite proud of our school and scholars. At the recent promotion examination at the 4th concession the three pupils, Tommy Irish, Armond Gordanier and Walter Gordanier who tried were successful. Walter Gordanier, the youngest of those who tried from three schools obtained the highest number of marks.

RECEPTION AT ODESSA.

Greeting to Rev. W. M. H. Quartermaine and Bride.

The village of Odessa has been in a flutter of excitement for the past few days, consequent upon the expected arrival of the Rev. W. M. H. Quartermaine and his bride. Mr. Quartermaine was appointed by the bishop to the newly formed mission of Odessa about one month ago, since which time he has taken to himself a wife, one of Brockville's fairest daughters. After an extended wedding tour through some of the principal cities of the United States they were met at Ernesttown station by a deputation from Odessa and escorted to their new home. On their arrival on Thursday evening they found to their surprise, that their house, previously engaged by Mr. Quartermaine, had been taken possession of by over one hundred of the village people. The rooms were nicely decorated with strips of bunting and flags, the grounds were illuminated with Chinese lanterns. There was a plentiful supply of refreshments of all kinds.

At eight o'clock the proceedings of the evening commenced. After a few complimentary remarks by Dr. Booth, as to the object of the gathering, an address was read to Mr. Burns, who has had charge of the Sabbath School work for some time, expressing the high esteem in which he was held by the people, and thanking him for the efforts put forth by him on behalf of the church. The address was accompanied with the presentation of a large full bound Webster's dictionary, on a beautiful mounted folding stand. Mr. Burns replied verbally in a few feeling words.

An address was then read to Mr. Quartermaine, welcoming him and his partner cordially to the field. It expressed a hope that, under his [illegible] the church, which had worked under difficulties for some two years, would now progress more rapidly. Mr. Quartermaine in his reply, said that he felt proud that his first parish should be that of Odessa, though the people had been so long connected with the Church of England, yet so much remained to be done. He reviewed the past and spoke highly of the work done by his predecessor. He said his first effort should be to erect a church. He would endeavor to carry on the services as they had been done in the past, but that if any differences arose from time to time as to what he did or said if the people would only ask the reason why it would be cheerfully

HOUSEHOLD.

Stay at Home.—A Word to Country Girls.

The following article, taken from an American periodical and addressed to American girls, yet applies with equal force to Canadian girls from the country who seek homes in our cities. In Toronto, Montreal, and even in some of the less populous centres, the destroyer lurks ever ready to seize and despoil the innocentand pure-minded girl from the farm or country-village:—

To the strong and healthy country maiden who seeks not only self-support, but greater excitement, every large city, with its wealth of trade and glittering show, seems a mine ready to yield its rich ore.

All kinds of girls—steady, earnest workers, and giddy, thoughtless and dissatisfied village belles—throng the railway and steamboat stations, utterly inexperienced, often nearly penniless, alone, and strangers. What do they mean to do? Universally, the answer is "Get work," as if it were to be had for the first asking. To obtain board "near by," or to "work for board," seems to their simple experience, very easy to manage. But what are the facts? Arriving in the hurried, rushing crowd, no one meets them, no one notices the bewildered, frightened amazement at so many people, no one directs to the safe shelter of some Young Woman's Christian Association, or lodging house. Ah, yes! here are one or two to notice; this policeman or this hackman, with the badge of authority on his cap, comes politely to the comely maiden and offers to show her to a respectable boarding-house kept by a kind landlady, at very cheap prices. And the unsuspecting girl gratefully accompanies her guide, admiring the wonderful machinery of a great government, to—a house of worse than death, from which she can never go out a pure honest woman. And the hackman or policeman pockets $200, for his half hour's trouble. This is painfully, terribly true. So true, that Christian women, slowly waking to the dreadful facts, have begun their work of opposition. In Boston, the Young Traveller's Aid Society provides for the distribution, on incoming trains and steam boats, of a printed slip bearing the words: "Important Notice to Women!" telling of the lodging houses on Berkeley and Warrenton treets. connected with the Young Women's Christian Association, warning the travelers to "beware of information received from unreliable sources." And to "find at the wharf a lady authorized to give information, wearing a blue badge marked Boston Y. W. C. A."

Every night these workers return with girls who otherwise would have nowhere to go. Think of the risk! Better than all it will be, when farmer's daughters and village girls will stay in their own safe homes, instead of venturing into the abyss of city filth, which even under favorable surroundings, is a miserable struggle for daily bread.

The competition is already so great that for every opening there are dozens of applications. The wages are so low that women who can keep from starving outright, nevertheless lose health and courage. If, after a steady grind, the young girl longs for recreation and fun, where can she find it? Unless she is happy enough to belong to Miss Dodge's Clubs, the Young Women's Christian Association, or some hearty social church, she must leave her cramped, cold bedroom to find her companions on the street or in the dance hall. And such companions! Not the steady, industrious men, for they will not be found there, but those only whose pleasure it will be to lure her from the virtue which has been her only protection. Is this life? Is this the excitement and freedom you long for, country inently fond of staying at home. Circumstances forced him to move from one lodging to another; but these little journeys remind one of Dr. and Mrs. Primrose's "migrations from the blue bed to the brown." On foreign soil Lamb would have felt forlorn, indeed. He went once to Paris, but the visit left no mark upon his life or writings; he went to Keswick also, to see Coleridge, and that did but serve to make him love the streets of London more. Not even Dr. Johnson loved them better, and he too, though with Boswell's help he reached the Hebrides, had small experience of travel. Certainly the greatest man of letters of this century was a home-keeper. Sir Walter Scott found abundant food for his genius in his native land, and did not need to go abroad even to paint foreign scenery.

Doing up Shirt Bosoms.

A laundress of large experience writes that the doing of that most difficult thing of all in laundry work—the doing up of shirt bosoms—may be made highly successful by observing the following procedure: Enough cold starch to last several months may be made of one ounce of laundry wax, two ounces of borax, one teacupful of water and three teacupfuls of starch. The borax and wax are dissolved in water, sufficiently heated for the purpose, but not hot enough to scald the starch; into this mix the pulverized starch after passing it through a flour seive. In using, take a teaspoonful of this prepared starch and dissolve in water that is not cold enough to prevent the wax from softening.

The hot starch is made, not very thick, and a teaspoonful is allowed to a shirt bosom, the hotter the liquid is the better. Apply a tablespoonful at a time, rubbing in well before putting on more, and after the right side will take up no more, apply to the under side. Unless the starch is well rubbed in, the iron will stick and specks and blisters will appear. The hot starching is done first, the bosom is allowed to dry and then the cold starching is done by dipping the bosoms in the liquid, wringing out and rubbing slightly. After an hour or so, iron, st rubbing the bosom carefully with a cloth wrung out in hot water, to equalize the starch on the surface.

A thin cloth is laid over the bosom the first time the iron is passed over it. When this is removed, dampen the surface of the bosom a little, and finally iron carefully until the finish is satisfactory. Let the outside cover of the ironing board be woolen cloth and the bosom will not stick to it.

Famous Home-Keepers.

What could Shakespeare mean by saying that "home-keeping youths have ever homely wit?" The greatest poet this island has produced was himself undoubtedly a home-keeper. There is no reason to believe that he ever crossed the sea, and on the "sweet soil" that produced him he found food enough and space enough for his amazing genius. He was born at Stratford, lived for years in London, and died at his birthplace; and there is, we believe, no record of his going elsewhere. Spenser crossed the sea to Ireland, but was, otherwise, scarcely more of a traveller than Shakespeare; and no one will credit the great author of "The Faerie Queene" with homely wit. Neither Cowley nor Bacon ever wandered further than France, and it was not until the philosopher was forced to remain quietly at home that he wrote the works to which he owes his fame. It would have been greatly more to Ben Jonson's credit if he had not accepted the post of travelling tutor to Sir Walter Raleigh's son. The young man, discovering "rare Ben's" weakness, is said to have made him dead drunk, and, when in this condition, to have caused him to be drawn on a car through the streets of Paris for the amusement of the bystanders. I suspect that, had he been in England, the wicked young wag would not have dreamt of such a misdemeanor. Bunyan, we all know, never went further from Bedford than London, and wrote his wonderful allegory in a prison. Defoe, although he travelled far from home in his books, did not go beyond Scotland in the flesh. Had it been his misfortune to undergo the painful adventures of "Robinson Crusoe," the world would never have had that delightful story. Defoe's contemporaries, Swift and Pope, the two wittiest men of the age, and men of the keenest intellects, did not find it necessary to travel in search of ideas. Pope's longest journey was to Bath; and Swift's life as a traveller was spent between Dublin and London. Congreve, although he was at one time Secretary to the Island of Jamaica, never left England, and felt painfully enough the disadvantage even of home-travel; for he died in consequence of being upset in his coach when on the way to Bath, the wished-for bourne in that age of every invalid. Thomson, too, met his death by going abroad; for he caught a fatal cold upon the Thames. He travelled on the Continent once, and the sole result of the journey was a dull poem on "Liberty" which it needs considerable courage to read. Cowper, who never crossed the sea, who never saw a mountain, and was daunted by the "tremendous height" of the Sussex hills, is, notwithstanding, one of the best of letter-writers and most delightful of poets. Would he have done better if he had visited China, or caught yellow fever in the West Indies? I trow not; and the mention of Cowper's name reminds me that Charles Lamb, with whom he had some points of affinity, was unlike him in one respect. Cowper lived upon country fare; while Lamb found all the nourishment he needed for his genius in London. Few men have kept so closely to the great city, or fixed their heart upon it with such avidity. Lamb was em-

Those Booming American Towns.

Port Arthur Herald: It is a habit of certain people to point to United States towns when they want to illustrate "go." A gentleman lately from Duluth says that in the zenith city there are at least 5,000 men out of employment. That large number does not include the bums and toughs who get as far away from work as they can, but only men who really want work and cannot get it. Business is bad there.

"Don't you sing?" enquired the musical young lady of the new arrival at the hotel, "why, how stupid of you!" "If you'd ever heard me try," said the young man, with an accent of conviction, "you'd think it was everlasting smart of me."

fession." "The line of your profession." "Yes, sir, the clothes line."

"This is the fourth time I've called you, William," said his wife. "You told me that you wanted to get up in good season this morning." "Yes," replied William, sleepily, "but it was last night when I told you that.

"Oh, tell me where is fancy bred?"
She asked, and getting bolder.
She laid her darling little head
Right down upon his shoulder.
And he, with no more poetry in His soul than in a Quaker's
Replied with idiotic grin,
"You'll find it at the baker's."

The Economical Scot.

He is not of brilliant qualities, but he is a man of solid ones, who can only be appreciated at his true worth when you have known him some time. He does not jump at you with demonstrations of love, nor does he swear you an eternal friendship; but if you know how to win his esteem, you may rely upon him thoroughly. He is a man who pays prompt cash, but will have the value of his money. If ever you travel with a Scotchman from Edinburgh to London, you may observe that he does not take his eyes off the country the train goes through. He looks out of the window all the time, so as not to miss a pennyworth of the money he has paid for his place. Remark to him, as you yawn and stretch yourself, that it's a long, tiring, tiresome journey, and he will probably exclaim, "Long, indeed, long! I should think so, sir; and so it ought to be for £2 17s 6d.?" I know of a Scot, who rather than pay the toll of a bridge in Australia, takes off his coat, which he rolls and straps on his back, in order to swim across the stream. He is not a miser. On the contrary, his generosity is well known in his own neighbourhood. He is simply an eccentric Scot, who does not see why he should pay for crossing a river that he can cross for nothing.

Eggs for Hatching.

I have watched my hens carefully during the laying season, and I am satisfied that it pays well to select eggs for hatching with care. I always take eggs of medium size as my experience teaches me that they produce the strongest and best formed chicks. I would as soon set a pointed egg as an oval one, provided there was no decided irregularity in the shape. I have found that very large eggs or those badly shaped, always produce badly shaped chickens. I can't see that pointed eggs indicate weakness or a tendency to disease, for the reason that some of my best hens always lay pointed eggs. I have noticed from time to time, rules for selecting eggs that will produce pullets. They have all failed in my practice. I have noticed, however, that where the cocks are exceptionally vigorous, there is a proportion of males.—[Ex.

Disease From Milk.

We frequently hear of deadly diseases, like typhoid and dihptheria, which are derived from milk. If the public could be instructed in the one simple fact that the germs of disease which are found in milk could be throttled at the earliest stage, and killed at any stage, I think that some good would be done, and many lives saved. We only want to make known the simple fact that by placing milk in a bottle and heating it to a certain degree of temperature, we can destroy the disease germs. This has been done in many of our best dairies and establishments in London, but the public in general do not know these facts, nor do many of the retail dealers know them.

HANDSOME MEN.

Mrs. Frank Leslie Gives Her Definition of Male Beauty.

To call a man charming in face, or lovely, or beautiful, or pretty, is to minimize—almost to insult him—writes Mrs. Frank Leslie. A man can only be called handsome, and very, very few men can be called that.

A handsome man must be manly in figure, conveying the idea of strength and energy under the most reposeful exterior. He must have the shapely hands, feet and all that tell of good blood and cultivated progenitors; he must have his head well shaped, well set and well carried.

Colouring does not much matter, so that there be no red upon the cheeks, and not too much in the lips, and perhaps the mezzo tints lend themselves most satisfactorily to manly beauty, but, above all, the handsome man must never be stout. The heavy throat which overflows the shirt collar never carries with it an air of refinement, whatever it may do of strength. A blonde man runs the risk of weakness and insipidity, and a black beard man is handsome, even though he be a trifle melodramatic, but still golden-haired and black-haired men have been very attractive the world over.

Of course, below this grand climacterie in the thoroughly handsome man there are ranks after ranks of good-looking, attractive, pleasant-faced men—some upon whom one loves to look and find sweet content in contemplating faces and forms far from faultless, and yet quite satisfactory. And here we come upon one of the most strange and almost cruel conditions of our being. A man may or may not be handsome, he may or may not have physical attractiveness whatever, but nobody likes him the less for the deficiency, he never finds it a barrier in his career, a source of failure in his life; women love him and men approve of him just as readily as if he is handsome; in fact, the woman or women who love him set him down as handsome in serene defiance of the rules of beauty or the opinion of the world.

What Can be Done by Strong Hinting.

Mrs. Hogan and her husband were neither of them overfond of work. They were perfectly willing to live upon the generosity of their neighbors, which they were by no means backward in soliciting.

One day Mrs. Hogan dropped into Mrs. Farnham's, her next door neighbor, just as the family were sitting down to supper.

Of course she was invited to sit down.

"Your tea's very good," said she; "I wish Mr. Hogan was here. He's very fond of tea, but we're very poor and can't afford to get it, it's so expensive."

This hint was considered rather a stron, one, so Mrs. Farnham handed Mrs. Hogan just as she was going, a pound parcel.

"Thank you," said Mrs. Hogan; "I'm glad to get the tea, but 'taint of much use without the milk."

A quart of milk was consigned to her charge.

"Well," said she, "now if we had some sugar we should be provided."

Mrs. Farnham procured a pound and gave is to her.

"Now," said Mrs. Hogan, "we shall stand a chance to have a good cup of tea. There's nothing I relish with tea like apple pie, as Mr. Hogan often says."

This hint was strong enough to bring out the article desired.

"After all," said Mrs. Hogan, as she took the pie into her hands, "pie ain't pie unless a body has cheese to eat with it. If there's anything I love it's cheese."

It was impossible to resist such an appeal

He is the War Lord.

The young German Emperor has shown by his very first official utterance that he dreams of battle flags and longs to cover himself with "glory." He is the "war-lord" of the German nation. Army, people, everything belong to him. It is "my" this, "my" that, my all the time. His thoughts are feudal. His ideal is the warrior chief sweeping like a whirlwind at the head of a battle charge. He is evidently autocratic in all his ways. The people are his property and he can do with them as he pleases. They have no rights which he is bound to respect except such as a man may render to his dog or an over-lord may feel called to yield to his thrall. All right. Let it come. The collision perhaps is inevitable. The tempest has burst in order that the atmosphere may be cleared. But when the turmoil is over is it quite certain that the German "war-lord" will find himself still firm in his seat? In the meantime it is one of earth's saddest necessities to have to watch the desolation and woe which one rash, ambitious, head-strong young man can cause the world over. Is this all the civilization that is going? Is this all that Christianity can effect after nineteen centuries of effort? The world is still wishing for peace, and the best informed are in a kind of half-hearted way still trying to give the lie to their fears. But the likelihood of such an issue is already but small and seems every day to be becoming smaller still. The dabblers in prophetic interpretations are rather pleased at the prospect and are saying jubilantly, "I told you so." They would rather that millions should be slaughtered than that their elaborate calculations and haphazard guesses should be falsified, and so the world, as in a vast amphitheatre, waits with breathless interest till the curtain rises and the next act of the mighty tragedy goes forward. It is felt to be an hour of momentous interest, and the nations listen with bated breath for the first clash of the crossing swords.

The Bull-Dogs.

R. G. O'Mally says: My remedy for bull dogs and flies on cattle is any kind of grease with a small quantity of coal oil mixed with it, rubbed in the parts that are most liable to be attacked, such as the face and nose, the dewlay and back of the arm or shoulder, also the flanks and udder, in fact where the skin is not thick enough to stand the bites or cannot be reached by the head or tail. For my horses I use common axle grease mixed with coal oil. Grease itself is very good, but the flies do not like the smell of oil. For stock in general that have to be out all day in pasture, bobbing them all would be quite a contract, and the best way out of the difficulty is to get some crotched trees and make posts of them, and make a shed of pole and scrub for the cattle to go into in the heat of the day, as anyone knows that bull-dogs will not stay in a building of any kind if they can get out of it.

How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

"After all," said Mrs. Hogan, as she took the pie into her hands, "pie ain't pie unless a body has cheese to eat with it. If there's anything I love it's cheese."

It was impossible to resist such an appeal as this. An ample slice having been placed in her possession she paused for a moment, as if considering whether there was not something else she might call for. Failing to think of anything she was about to move off when a thought struck her.

"These things are rather heavy and I ain't so strong as I used to be. I don't know as I shall be able to get home."

Mrs. Farnham volunteered to send her son John to carry a part of the articles, an offer which Mrs. Hogan accepted without the least hesitation. When John had landed his load Mrs. Hogan hinted that she had some wood she would like to have split, but John didn't believe in hints and left without taking it.

The Republican Delegate.

A Chicago correspondent of the New York Times says:--The delegate is not as numerous as he will be, still he is numerous and he is easily distinguished. He wears an air that would not become persons engaged in the ordinary affairs of life. He is of two varieties. If of one, he has been at National conventions before; if of the other, this is his first experience. Upon the former the consequential air is worn with ease; it fills its wearer with a comforting sense of importance. Upon the latter it often sits like a misfit, and is evidently worn under the impression that it is one of those things without which no delegate to a National convention should appear in public.

The delegate is gregarious, and he is also a monopolist. He grabs the best seats in the busses, the best rooms at the hotel, the best seats at the table, but being a necessity he is welcomed with an air of unbounded cordiality by everybody, but principally by the hotel keepers. Once at the hotel the delegate becomes gregarious, and finds his way to the large, open space, usually designated as the rotunda, as naturally as water rolls down hill. He is coming by every train, but only in retail lots, therefore he does not form in line and march to his favourite caravansary headed by a brass band and wearing garments that would, on any other occasion, elicit original but not complimentary remarks from the rising generation. The skirmisking line is attired according to the taste of its individual members, and some of the rigs are but evidences of the vastness of a country which compel men in one portion of it to don straw hats and linen dusters, while in another section—at the same period of the year—fashion prescribes Prince Albert coats and slouch hats.

tinent. Indeed with the late manumission in Brazil the work may be said, as far as law is concerned, to be complete. It takes a long time, however, to undo all the evils which slavery has caused. Still the work of undoing is going on all the time. It is said that already in a great number of cases the negroes in the Southern States are undergoing marked changes in their physical peculiarities even where there is no miscegenation. The flat noses and the woolly hair are, it is said, disappearing and so are the thick lips. Why this should take place is not very evident, but if it does there must be some reason for it, either in the better food or in the greater intelligence secured by freedom.

A railroad running through Emanuel County recently killed a razor-back hog belonging to a widow, and she entered a suit for damages for the value of it. The railroad won the case, it being shown that the proper signals were blown and the precautions taken, and the plaintiff was sorely distressed about the result. She had converted the pig into lard, and, as the road would not pay for killing him, she bestowed what remained of the porker on the company. On a dark night she took the pot of grease, and proceeding to the track of the company, coated the rails with a liberal daub of grease for about a quarter of a mile. It took all the sand that the engines could bring to bear on the track for two days to tide over the spot which crippled traffic. Now the widow is threatened with a lawsuit.

There are more people miserable from waiting for what they call "a chance" than perhaps from any other cause, for as Carlyle says, "Idleness is worst, idleness alone is without hope; work earnestly at anything, you will by degrees learn to work at almost all things. There is endless hope in work, were it even work at making money." Waiting, wishing, fretting, moping, mooning. Oh the misery, oh the desolation! Better, infinitely better to wheel stones all day from one corner of a yard simply to wheel them back again. All the day idle! Nothing to awaken interest! Nothing to call forth effort! Nothing to stir up hope! Better than that drive a scavenger cart, become an "odourless excavator" or pick out pieces of burnt coal from any or every cinder heap. The curse of gentility is upon multitudes. They must not only have work, but work suitable for their own blessed and most superfine selves.

LASHED TO THE MAST.

How Captain Soper and Crew of the Zouave Were Found and Rescued.

Thirteen men lashed to the mainmast of a water logged hulk, over which the seas constantly broke for three days, with scarcely any water or food, two men killed and several vessels passing, but signals unheeded and no assistance rendered!

Such in brief was the experience of Captain Soper and the crew of the ship Zouave, as related to a reporter by Mate Albert Richmond, of the Zouave, on board the ship Larnica—which rescued them.

The Zouave left Mobile on April 20 loaded with pitch pine lumber for Queensborough, England. The crew consisted of fifteen, all told. The vessel encountered a succession of gales soon after leaving port and scudded before them most of the time under goosewinged maintopsail. Oil was used, but it proved of little effect in the raging seas. The vessel sprang a leak, and for twenty days the men toiled at the pumps, the water constantly gaining, despite their efforts.

ON BEAM ENDS.

On May 22 a hurricane struck her aft on the port side and the old hull was unable to withstand the tempest's fury. She went on her beam ends and the fore and mizzen masts went by the board. The captain had decided on abandoning her as the tempest had lulled, just before the hurricane came upon them. The steward and cabin boy at the time had gone below to secure some provisions. The former is supposed to have been drowned. The cabin boy escaped. A sailor who jumped into the water went down like lead and was lost. Another was knocked off his feet and his head cut open. He managed to regain his footing, however, and joined his mates, who were clinging desperately to the shrouds and port rigging. The vessel remained in that position, with the sea dashing over the men and almost washing them away from their precarious position. Then she suddenly righted. The fore and mizzen rigging had broken loose.

The men climbed into the main rigging and lashed themselves to the mainmast. One of them discovered part of a porpoise tail in the crosstrees, and this on the second day was divided among the crew and ravenously devoured.

OH, FOR WATER!

It rained a little on May 24, and the men managed to catch a little water in their hands which they greedily drank. But it was only sufficient to aggravate their thirst. Several vessels passed that day, but too far away to be hailed, and the men had nothing to use as a signal except a piece of blanket which Mate Richmond had secured.

RESCUED AT LAST.

They had practically given up hope when, at five o'clock on the morning of the 25th, the officers of the Larnica saw the signal and bore down on the wreck. Captain Soper had suffered the most from exposure, but all were able to walk and were transferred to the Larnica's decks in the ship's lifeboat. The seas were still running tremendously high, but the transfer was accomplished without accident.

STABBED HIS SLEEPING MATE.

The Larnica had experienced, like the Zouave, gale after gale, but had passed through them in good shape. Everything moveable was washed from her decks, but her rigging and hull were unimpared. Her voyage after rescuing the Zouave's crew, however, was marked with an incident that very narrowly missed being a tragedy. On the night of June 3rd a Scotch sailor named Bandiman, stealing noiselessly to the berth of another sailor, named Wheeler, stabbed the sleeping man in seven places with a sheath knife. Wheeler's cries awoke the small Kanaka out to put up the bills. He didn't see any when he went out, and investigation disclosed that the small Kanaka had eaten up all the paste and thrown the posters away. He begged some of the company to stick them up, but they were all too high-toned, and Booth had to go off himself in the middle of the night and paste his bills up. He said he came back with fifty dollars, just as he started, and they had lived on bananas principally.

Carlyle's Description of War.

When are the nations of the earth going to be wise enough to see the folly and the wickedness of war? How long is it to be before they rank the man with a sword by his side with the other man with a cleaver over his shoulder, only putting the latter in point of honor a great way further up, for he kills sheep and bullocks in order to feed men, while the former mangles men in order to feed pride, lust, cruelty, and every crime known either in the codes of earth or of heaven. It is worth while reprinting once more Carlyle's well known description of war in all its native hideousness and absurdity:

"What, speaking in quite unofficial language, is the net purport and upshot of War? To my own knowledge, for example, there dwell and toil, in the British village of Dumdrudge, usually some five hundred souls. From these, by certain 'Natural Enemies' of the French, there are successively selected, during the French war, say, thirty able-bodied men; Dumdrudge, at her own expense, has suckled and nursed them; she has, not without difficulty and sorrow, fed them up to manhood, and even trained them to crafts, so that one can weave, another build, another hammer, and the weakest can stand under thirty stone avoirdupois. Nevertheless, amid much weeping and swearing, they are selected; all dressed in red; and shipped away, at the public charges, some two thousand miles, or say only to the south of Spain; and fed there till wanted. And now to that same spot in the south of Spain, are thirty similar French artisans, from a French Dumdrudge, in like manner wending; till at length, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition; and Thirty stands fronting Thirty, each with a gun in his hand; straightway the word 'Fire' is given; and they blow the souls out of one another; and in place of sixty brisk, useful craftsmen, the world has sixty dead carcasses which it must bury, and anew shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the Devil is, not the smallest! They lived far enough apart; were the entirest strangers; nay, in so wide a Universe, there was even, unconsciously, by commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them. How then? Simpleton! their Governors had fallen out; and, instead of shooting one another, had the cunning to make these poor blockheads shoot.——Alas, so is it in Deutschland, and hitherto in all lands; still as of old, "What devilry soever Kings do, the Greeks must pay the piper!"

Is all that not honestly, literally true? Have the bears thus described been one bit less abused or more justifiable than is here set forth? And yet men still go prancing like so many lunatic monkeys to the music of the fife and drum, and so called ministers of the Prince of Peace preach their inflated, illiterate bombast, which they call patriotic sermons in order to make men and boys, nay, even girls, to fall in love with war. The wars of European and American nations during the period from 1790 to 1880, or ninety years, destroyed four millions and four hundred and seventy thousands of human lives; and fifteen billions and two hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars of the proceeds of human industries. This is an average of fifty thousand lives and of

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

Craft is merely the supplement of inferior abilities.

Woman tempted man to eat; he took to drinking of himself.—[Swift.

The fundamental qualities of true friendship are constancy and fidelity.

Culture is getting the power, through reading, to estimate the proportion and relation in what we read.

The follies of the fool are hidden from himself, but known to the world; those of the wise man are known to himself, but hidden from the world.—[Confucius.

If two men have a misunderstanding it is better to talk it out than to fight it out. An enlightened understanding is better in such a case than a bloody nose or a pair of black eyes.—[T. V. Powderly.

At whatever period of life friendships are formed, so long as they continue sincere and affectionate, they form undoubtedly one of the greatest blessings we can enjoy.

To be happy is no selfish indulgence, no favored condition of fortune; it is a duty we owe to others and to ourselves, a state of mind which we should all strive to acquire.

It has been asserted that if men were to confine their conversation to what they understand, we should witness frequently on earth what St. John witnessed once in heaven: "Silence for the space of half-an-hour.—[Catholic Annual.

The maxim that has been laid down by certain crooked politicians, to behave to a friend with the same guarded caution as we would do to an enemy, because it is possible that he may one day become such, discloses a mind that was never made for the enjoyment of friendship.

Human nature is not a machine to be built after a model, and set to do exactly the work prescribed for it, but a tree, which requires to grow and develop itself on all sides, according to the tendency of the inward forces which make it a living thing.—[John Stuart Mill.

There is not a horse willing to work but can get his food and shelter in requital; a thing the two-footed worker has to seek for, to solicit occasionally in vain. And yet it is currently reported that the two-footed worker has an immortal soul within him.—[Carlyle.

There is something nobler than all these—something that rises above wealth and power, something above lands and palaces, something above raiment and gold. It is the love of right, the cultivation of the moral nature, the desire to do justice, the inextinguishable love of human liberty.—[Robert Ingersoll.

Prepared.

A minister's wife, who is not so serious-minded as her husband is, tells some laughable stories relating to marriage ceremonies which her husband performed while they were living in a newly settled district in the west.

This minister always felt it to be his duty to give each young couple a little serious advice before he performed the marriage ceremony, and for this purpose he usually took them aside, one at a time, and talked very soberly to each of them regarding the great importance of the step they were to take and the new responsibilities they were to assume.

One day he talked in his most earnest manner for several minutes to a young woman who had come to be married to a bright-looking young man.

"And now," he said, in closing, "I hope you fully realize the extreme importance of very narrowly missed being a tragedy. On the night of June 3rd a Scotch sailor named Bandiman, stealing noiselessly to the berth of another sailor, named Wheeler, stabbed the sleeping man in seven places with a death knife. Wheeler's cries awoke the other sailors, who speedily secured and disarmed the Scotchman, although he struggled desperately, Bandiman was put in irons and locked in one of the staterooms of the cabin. His subsequent conduct proved to Captain Boyd that he had a lunatic sailor on his hands. The man was closely watched until the ship reached her dock at Erie Basin yesterday.

The wounds inflicted on Wheeler were not of a serious nature, though loss of blood made him very weak. Bandiman will be handed over to the English authorities.

Mrs. Stowe in Florida.

A writer in the Lewiston, Me., Journal, peaking of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe and her Florida home, says:

The style of the interior is neither literary, religious, artistic, nor rural, but a peculiar combination of all four, which is a family trait. Prominent in the study, in a niche between two windows, stands a picture of Henry Ward Beecher, so large, so strong, so life-like, that it seems as if he were the host, standing ready to entertain the guests of his sister. Many fine paintings of a semi-religious cast cover the walls, and by the old masters. Her book-shelves are ranged in the walls, not hanging outside them or in cases, and flowers in the greatest profusion fill every nook and corner. Blue pervades the furnishing; the Venus de Milo, the Madonna and Child, and the Duke and Duchess of Argyll keep each other mute company through the long unbroken stillness which bespeaks the frequent absences of the gontle hostess, for she is a great outdoor woman, and may be seen taking her walks, step by step, through the trees these beautiful June mornings, her plain black dress covered with dandelion down, her hands filled with flowers, and her thin, dark face, browned by constant exposure, framed in loose gray locks and black bonnet neither peaceful nor troubled, but waiting.

The dim gray eyes light up in conversation, and some sparks come from between the pale lips, now and again, that impress one with what must have been. Her manners have a more kindly than courteous air, and are tinted with the grace of modern as well as old-time customs. Her hearing is wonderfully acute, and her intelligence glides along side by side with her guests, whom she receives with the air of an old traveler hailing a young one from some foreign part—neither curious nor interested, but forbearing.

An Actor in Honolulu.

Booth told a very amusing story when he was here last of a trip he took to Honolulu, when he was younger and knocking about California. Some actor came up from Australia who had stopped at the Sandwich Islands. He inflamed Booth on the subject of that dramatic El Dorado. He scraped together all the money he could and went to Honolulu. He had fifty dollars when he arrived. With that money he hired the theatre for five weeks at ten dollars a week. He found two or three people and made arrangements to give a show. It was to be "Richard III." The two or three people played all the parts. One man played four, and one woman two, and so on. The question of billing the town arose. He managed to get some posters, but he had not a rag to stick them up with. He bought a bucket of "poi" and some starch or stuff that would help it, mixed his paste and sent a nations during the period from 1790 to 1880, or ninety years, destroyed four millions and four hundred and seventy thousands of human lives; and fifteen billions and two hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars of the proceeds of human industries. This is an average of fifty thousand lives and of one hundred and sixty five millions of dollars for each year of that period. And what has been the nett gain from all this waste? Gain! It has been only loss, and this immense loss of life and property would all have been avoided, if nominal and professed Christian nations had been Christian in spirit and in truth,—if the wisest, purest, and most cultivated Christian citizens had guided the nation.

Slavery in Brazil Abolished.

The enthusiasm of the Brazilians over the abolition of slavery in the empire of Brazil is glowingly described in the papers of Rio de Janeiro. We are told that the rejoicing was universal, and that the whole population, of all colors, were overcome with noble emotion. In order to give the great act of abolition a sacred character the Senate held a Sunday session for its adoption, and the Princess Regent put her signature to it on the same day. The city was hung with banners, the citizens marched in gay procession, bands of music played as they paraded, and the feast of freedom was turned into a carnival of glory. There seems to have been hardly a sign of opposition, either in the Senate or among the people, to the act of abolition, which has given lustre to the reign of Dom Pedro, and which was promoted and signed by the worthy Princess who reigns in his absence. When we recall the circumstances under which emancipation was brought about in Spanish America and in the British West Indies, and in the Southern States of our Union, we must give especial honor to Brazil and her rulers for what has been so happily accomplished.

Quack Advertisements

Are rapidly becoming a nuisance, and we think it behooves publishers to examine into the merits of many articles puffed up in their columns. We do not deny that many meritorous remedies are properly to be classed under this heading. Take the hundreds and thousands relieved from severe suffering by the use of Polson's NERVILINE, would it not be unreasonable to expect them to condemn that far-famed remedy. Now we know for a fact that Polson's Nerviline is without exception the most powerful, pleasant and certain remedy in the world for pain. It cannot fail, for it goes right to the bottom of pain, penetrates to the nerves, soothes them into quietness, and affords prompt and permanent relief. Nerviline is sold by all druggists. Sample only 10 cents. Try it.

Moving Rapidly.

Policeman (to citizen clinging to lamp post)—My friend, you will have to move on.

Citizen—Move (hic) on! Gra-gracious, ofshur, I'm (hic) makin' fifty milsh 'n hour now.

Rural Thrift.

Little Girl—Mrs. Brown, ma wants to know if she could borrow a dozen eggs. She wants to put 'em under a hen.

Neighbor—So you've got a hen setting, have you? I didn't know you kept hens.

Little Girl—No'm we don't, but Mrs. Smith 's goin' ter lend us a hen that wants ter set, an' ma thought if you'd lend us eggs some, we've got the nest ourselfs.

Ex-boarding-house keeper (at heaven's gate)—May I come in? St. Peter—I'm afraid the children would annoy you. The place without children is over there to the left.

One day he talked in his most earnest manner for several minutes to a young woman who had come to be married to a bright-looking young man.

"And now," he said, in closing, "I hope you fully realize the extreme importance of the step you are taking, and that you are prepared for it."

"Prepared?" she said, innocently, "well, if I ain't prepared I don't know who is. I've got four common quilts and two nice ones, and four brand new feather-beds, ten sheets and twelve pairs of pillow slips, four all-linen table-cloths, a dozen spoons and a good six-quart brass kittle. If I ain't prepared no girl in this county ever was!"

"Promising Churches."

At the Unitarian festival in Boston a minister from St. Louis remarked that when ministers came to the "unfenced pasture" in the West he was always tempted to warn them of the privations that awaited them in "promising churches"—that is, churches that promise to pay $700 a year or more and do not keep their promise. Some ministers have found such "promising churches" without taking such a long trip.

Will You Read This for $500?

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are abundantly responsible financially, as any one can easily ascertain by enquiry, have offered, in good faith, a standing reward of $500 for a case of nasal catarrh, no matter how bad or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists at 50 cents.

But they whom Truth and Wisdom lead,
Can gather honey from a weed."

Those who are wise and who love the truth, will believe what we say when we tell them that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done more to relieve the sufferings of women, than all other medicines now known to science. It cures all irregularities, internal inflammation and ulceration, displacements and kindred troubles. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Red bandanna handkerchiefs have risen in price.

"Logic is Logic."

Now there was the case of our friend McKay:
He said to himself, in his resolute way,
That a cough which was growing from bad to worse
Must be cured, in spite of a slender purse.
An ocean voyage was out of the question,
A Florida trip a useless suggestion;
Yet die he wouldn't! His money he paid
For the "Golden Medical Discovery," by Dr. Pierce made;
And as sound as a nut in his health to-day—
"Logic is logic, that's all I say."

Where Canada Has the Advantage.

Montreal Witness: It seems incredible that even in Montana eight men could stop a train and rob the passengers, but this occurred near Junction City on Sunday night. A light on the track stopped the train, a fusillade of bullets scared everyone into obedience and the robbers then went through the cars and robbed the passegers. The only man who resisted got a bullet through his hat to quiet him. It was on the Northern Pacific Railway that this occurred. Had it been on the Canadian Pacific what a noteworthy circumstance it would have seemed to the whole United States press. But over there they treat such an occurrence as less surprising than the sea serpent, and often make both the subject of merriment.

—It's a pity that The Ontario, in announcing that "a diciple of Blackstone in Napanee, formerly of Belleville," was shortly to lead Miss Sara Duncan, Garth Grafton, to hymen's altar, omitted to give the name of our townsman. He would have had more free advertising than any other individual in the community.

The bridge is one of the finest structures in the county and reflects much credit upon the engineering abilities of the township's popular reeve.

—The following we clip from Monday's Ontario, of Belleville: Louise Whiteman was provided with lodging by the city over Sunday. Pope, of the West Belleville Methodist Church preached in the same pulpit, from the 20th vs. of Eph. 2. The speaker showed that Christ's character had been tried in various ways and had been unharmed; He was a sure foundation.

—The Belleville Ontario is to the front with the following, which it is hoped will not be the experience this year: Thirty-one years ago last Wednesday it commenced to rain heavily in Kingston and vicinity at seven o'clock in the evening, and continued till seven o'clock on the following evening, July 12. The road between Kingston and Cataraqui was blocked with floating planks and rails, and the Bath road was not fit to travel on. Logs floated from the farms of Peter Day and the Baker farm, and impeded progress, while the G. T. R. track at Colinsby was covered with water.

—The lawn festival at the home of Mr. Thos. Dickens, East Napanee, on Friday night, proved an enjoyable affair. The grounds were nicely lighted by Chinese lanterns, and seats were placed here and there on the lawn. The evening being rather too cool for a number of those in attendance, resort was had to the fine residence of Mr. Dickens, where the programme provided for the occasion was carried out. The singing, readings and addresses were pleasing, and the promenade in the nice grounds much enjoyed. During the first and second parts of the programme ice cream and cake were served to all present. About $15 was added to the treasury of the Y.P.A. of the Western Methodist church, under whose auspices the social was held —There was a meeting of the board of education on Tuesday night, the following members being in attendance: Chairman Sexsmith, Secretary Gurlette, and Messrs. On motion of Mr. Hall, the committee on school property was instructed to erect a wire fence along the northern line of the new high school grounds, to protect the trees. On motion of Mr. Morden, the committee on school property for the respective schools was instructed to make the necessary repairs to the schools during vacation. An account of $1.25 from Jas Plumley, for watering trees, and another of $3.50, from Templeton & Beeman, for fifty copies of rules for janitor, were ordered to be paid, and the board adjourned.

SADLY AFFLICTED.

Death Visits the Home of Mr. Mace, Tamworth, and Carries off two Daughters.

The home of W. D. Mace, Tamworth, has been sorely tried this week. His partner in life being ill for some time was at Kingston under medical treatment. During her absence that dreaded disease, diptheria, entered the home and laid hold of the youngest daughter, Jessie, a most pleasing, pretty and promising young girl of five years. After an illness of two days death claimed her as its victim at about 11 o'clock Tuesday morning.

This was not the only sorrow Mr. Mace and his almost prostrated partner were called upon to endure. After coming home from Jessie's funeral on Wednesday, Bella, the eldest daughter, felt very faint and thought to revive herself by partaking of some brandy. She mistook a bottle of carbolic acid, used for fumegating the house, for brandy and swallowed a portion of the burning fluid. Immediately the poor girl detected the mistake and informed the family. Medical aid was summoned, but the efforts of two doctors proved unavailing and within fifteen minutes she died in great pain. Miss Bella was aged 18, and was an estimable young lady, beloved by all who knew her She returned only a few days before from Ottawa, where she had completed her education. The funeral takes place today at 2 p.m.

The shock was almost too much for the afflicted mother and sorrowing sister, Myrtie. It was at one time feared that the latter, who had become quite ill, would also be carried off, but we are exceedingly pleased to be able to state that at latest accounts, just before going to press, this morning both were out of danger and were enduring the affliction with the greatest fortitude.

In his sore trial Mr Mace has the sympathy of a large circle of acquaintances, who trust that He who doeth all things well, will give the necessary consolation.

Capture and Release.

For some time there has been a family by the name of Wyman, who have caused considerable trouble at Newburgh. A few days ago the mother made an assault upon a Mr. Hooley at Thompson's mills and for which a warrant was issued and placed in the hands of Constable Storms of this place for execution. Jerry, with some assistance, proceeded to Newburgh and at once visited the house. He arrived there just as the door was about to be closed, which he prevented. No sooner had he accomplished it than down went an axe just in front of him. Immediately he grabbed it and the woman, and calling for assistant Hooper, the handcuffs were placed on the individual in quick order. Before she really realized that she was secure, Mrs. Wiman tried to free herself; finding, however that it was useless the woman let out a string of oaths the like of which Mr Storms said he never heard before. She was brought to Napanee, given a hearing and her case remanded. Upon its being recalled the complainant was not in attendance. After waiting about half an hour the Police Magistrate dismissed the case. In fifteen minutes afterwards Mr Hooley put in an appearance and was very much disappointed to find that Mrs Wyman was once more free and on her way home.

—Wednesday night about 11 o'clock the fire alarm sounded and the firemen turned out in quick time. The fire, which was at the slaughter house of Mr. Thos. Trimble, on Frederick st., in the western part of the town, could not be reached in time to do any service, so the engine was stopped en route. The building was completely destroyed. Mr. Trimble estimates his loss at about $500, on which he has an insurance of $330 in the Queen's. The fire is supposed to be the work of an incendiary, as there was no fire, through smoking or otherwise, at the place.

--This week Mr. John Bennett of the 7th con. North Fredericksburgh, has been considerably tried. Tuesday he was proceeding to the rear of his farm with his team and mower, to mow some hay, when his horses ran away. He was thrown from the machine on the opposite side to that on which the cutting knife is carried, escaping with several slight bruises. The horses were also unharmed, but the mower was smashed in such a manner that it is impossible to repair it. Wednesday night's storm laid the new patent fence he had just erected across his farm low. In some instances the posts were snapped off at the ground, and others lifted right out. A colt which was tied for a little to one part of the fence was carried off its feet by the gust and tossed in the air in such a manner that it was feared it would be injured; fortunately it freed itself of its fastening and escaped uninjured.

NAPANEE SENSATIONS

The Gossips have Two Sweet Morsels to Talk About.

Ungentlemanly Treatment of a Napanee Lady

By the Hon. M. Bowell, Min. of Customs.

A Likely Breach of Promise Suit.

Seldom in the history of Napanee have the gossip-mongers had more "sweet morsels" to talk about than they have during the past two weeks. Dame Rumor has been fully alive and great have been the stories cast afloat. From the whole THE EXPRESS has been able to secure the full facts and give them to the public to-day.

The first was the unseemly conduct of two individuals who carry their heads high in society. The information regarding this case reached our reporter just a little before the forms for last issue were being closed. At once he betook himself to the fountain-head for particulars, but was rather late—the peacemaker, or justice miscarrier, had been ahead. Making known his mission the reply was given "Oh! they're all right." At once the reporter gave up the case for that day, as he had not time to "work it up" for the next day's issue. Taking it quietly since, he has gleaned the following: On Tuesday night, July 31st, the two men above referred to, whose names we need not give, as they are pretty well known by this time, who were somewhat the worse of liquor, followed a woman up John street with supposed evil intent. Reaching Anderson's livery stable, the woman entered and shortly afterwards came out again. She retraced her steps down John-st and was followed. Returning once more to the livery stable house the men commenced a conversation with one of the colored women who resides in the premises. The conversation grew, the woman, as far as we have been able to learn, being finally insulted. Not being able to secure accurate information as to this point, THE EXPRESS has to draw conclusions. This is, however, readily done from what followed. The husband of the woman arose and gave the evil designers chase. The younger of the two, whose residence was not far distant, managed to escape, but the given her a trial trip with his family aboard. Fortunately Mrs Stevenson was one of the friends of Holmes' family, which made matters much more easy to handle. A trip was arranged for—the party to be composed of Ministers Tupper and Bowell, Mr Holmes' family and friends, and—"perhaps it would be well to invite the member and his wife" On the morning of July 2nd, the Cruiser set off for the sail up the bay, under pleasant auspices, with about fifteen aboard besides the crew. Those who watched her move off from the dock had not the slightest conjecture that the minister of customs had his eye on one of our ladies for a wife. Such was, however, the case. The boat ploughed through the waters nicely; dinner was served—first to the ministers and a number more; then the others sat down and in regular outing style the hon gentlemen acted as waiters. Had Capt. Holmes not been compelled to stick to the wheel house so closely, he, with the knowledge he possessed, might have noticed the sly, longing glances that were now and again given by Mr. Bowell towards Mrs Stevenson. Suspicions were not at all aroused and everything went as "merry as a marriage bell" the day through. After visiting the Murray canal the boat returned to Deseronto. Fortunately (!) it was too dark for Capt. Holmes, who had not steered up the river very often, to venture home that night with the Cruiser. Accordingly the company separated. The younger portion of the party betook themselves to a private assembly which was taking place in the village, while other members of the boat load took the mixed and midnight trains for the east. Mr. Bowell took a course of his own. He invited Mrs. Stevenson to a ride home in a carriage. This was accepted. During the drive over to Napanee he "popped the question." Mrs Stevenson did not finally accept the proposition, asking several days to consider it. She, however, a couple of days later accepted and from that on they were engaged.

The date of the next meeting we cannot give, but it was not long after. Then Mr. Bowell wished the day for the wedding fixed. At first he was desirous of having the ceremony performed very quietly and at once. It was, however, fixed for August 15 h.

Everything continued to move along nicely. The son of the hon. gentleman visited our town, spent considerable of his time with the friends of his father's intended wife; the engagement ring was presented; other presents were made; the wedding trousseau was being looked after and the wedding cake ordered. Mrs. Stevenson was complimented on all sides on the prospect of becoming the wife of him who stood so high in the political arena of Canada. But how true that there's "many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." Joy has given place to sadness.

As in other instances "son-in-law Jamieson" has brought Mackenzie Bowell into not too pleasant positions before the public, so it would seem to be the case in this. On the 3rd of August Jamieson visited Napanee, and has, we understand, been on several other occasions in town. What his mission was no one at the time suspected, unless it was to make better acquaintance with those with whom he and his father-innouncement of the marriage. When the engagement was at first announced it was denied, which was somewhat looked for. Still when the day was fixed, and all arrangements were being furthered, it was hardly expected that he would allow matters to go the length they have. In the Globe of the 13th appeared a telegram from Belleville, in which it was stated that he said he had paid some attention to Mrs. Stevenson on his last visit here, "but the announcement of the wedding was made without my consent." The Mail of the same date said that "there was no truth whatever in the report that he will be married before leaving for the Pacific coast," and The Empire of the same day stated "that the report of the minister of customs' intended marriage is incorrect." This was not enough. On the 13th, two days before the date he himself fixed for the wedding, Mr. Bowell must inform the Ottawa correspondent of The Empire "that all the rumors which have been in circulation with regard to his proposed marriage are incorrect." Such conduct is shameful in the extreme. It looks as though the old man was doting, foolish, or that he had set a deliberate trap to ensnare and destroy the future prospects of a woman.

These would-be denials are made in the face of stubborn facts, such as the passing of the engagement ring; the inviting, by himself, of his friends, and the acceptance by one of them up to Thursday; and the engaging of the Archdeacon to marry him. On one of his recent visits (the beginning of last week, when Mr. James Herring had an evening party, at which C. J. Bowell was was a guest, while his father paid his attentions to his intended next door) Mr. John Stevenson tendered the old gentleman an invitation to make his home his stopping place on the Tuesday evening previous and up to the hour of the wedding on Wednesday. This was accepted in the presence of some friends of the Stevenson families. On Saturday morning, with the mail conveying the letter to Mrs. Stevenson breaking up the wedding, came another epistle to Mr. John Stevenson thanking him for his kind offer, but declining it "for reasons which Mrs. E. Stevenson could give if she chose," and with the same mail was a third letter, cancelling the services of the Archdeacon. In the face of these facts it is cruel for a man to endeavor to throw all the blame on a woman.

Since the above was in type we notice the following in the Ottawa Free Press of the 15th: "Hon Mr Bowell, in conversation with a Free Press reporter to-day, gave the statement of his alleged engagement a denial." In reply, and to further substantiate what we have before said, we would just say that Mr. Bowell personally wrote Archdeacon Bedford-Jones, asking him to officiate at the marriage of himself and Mrs Stevenson, to which the clergyman replied, saying that he would be happy to do so and complimenting him upon his good fortune. Then, in addition, Mr. Bowell, when joked about the affair by various persons in town, did not deny that it was to take place. The wedding attire was being made by Messrs. Robinson & Co. and Hooper & Doxsee and the order for the cake was given to Mr. W. H. Davis.

At once the reporter gave up the case for that day, as he had not time to "work it up" for the next day's issue. Taking it quietly since, he has gleaned the following: On Tuesday night, July 31st, the two men above referred to, whose names we need not give, as they are pretty well known by this time, who were somewhat the worse of liquor, followed a woman up John street with supposed evil intent. Reaching Anderson's livery stable, the woman entered and shortly afterwards came out again. She retraced her steps down John-st and was followed. Returning once more to the livery stable house the men commenced a conversation with one of the colored women who resides in the premises. The conversation grew, the woman, as far as we have been able to learn, being finally insulted. Not being able to secure accurate information as to this point, THE EXPRESS has to draw conclusions. This is, however, readily done from what followed. The husband of the woman arose and gave the evil designers chase. The younger of the two, whose residence was not far distant, managed to escape, but the one with the beard was not so fortunate. The infuriated husband managed to secure his man and a "row" followed, the neighbors being aroused by the cries. It did not last long, so that those disturbed were soon at rest again. Next day "go-betweens" were set to work and continued up to Thursday, when, notwithstanding that a partial engagement was made by the enraged husband with the police magistrate to meet him that evening, justice was miscarried. For $15 the case was settled. It is hoped that this escapade during the absence of his wife will be a wholesome lesson to the man with the spectacles, who has figured in several shady affairs previous to this, and who was quite willing to stand by and see an opponent in politics punished rather severely when he knew that he could have helped him out of the difficulty nicely had he so chosen. He chose rather to see his fellowman bear the brunt of the whole affair. It is an old saying that "chickens come home to roost," and in this the young man came nigh being caught. Should he be found in a similar case again, it is to be hoped it will not be so readily settled.

Mr. Bowell's Love Affair.

The above case had just been nicely secured by the gossip-mongers, when a rumor was set afloat that Hon. M. Bowell was to be married on the 15th to Mrs. E. S. D. Stevenson, of this place. This was cause for comment in fair circles particularly, until Saturday last, when it became known that the engagement was broken off, even more abruptly than it was made. Then all sorts of rumors were started.

The history of this case commences with the laying of the corner stone of our new post office. It will be remembered that this took place on Thursday, June 21st, the officiating gentlemen being the Hons. H. Langevin and M. Bowell. After the stone had been laid and speeches made, mayor Cook took the ministers in hand. During the afternoon they were, with some of the Drs friends, driven round town. Among the latter was Mrs E. S. D. Stevenson, who was introduced by the mayor to the honorable gentleman. As he afterwards said Mr Bowell was at once struck with the pleasing manner and gracefulness of the accomplished widow, and, as he also afterwards said, determined if he could win her to have her for his wife.

The good looking widower of sixty four summers immediately set to work and "played his cards" well up to Thursday last. Capt Holmes of this place had been appointed fishery overseer for northern waters and was placed in charge of the yacht Cruiser which the government had recently purhased from Mr. Gilmour. The boat was still at Kingston, the Captain not having as yet the ceremony performed very quietly and at once. It was, however, fixed for August 15 h.

Everything continued to move along nicely. The son of the hon. gentleman visited our town, spent considerable of his time with the friends of his father's intended wife; the engagement ring was presented; other presents were made; the wedding trousseau was being looked after and the wedding cake ordered. Mrs. Stevenson was complimented on all sides on the prospect of becoming the wife of him who stood so high in the political arena of Canada. But how true that there's "many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." Joy has given place to sadness.

As in other instances "son-in-law Jamieson" has brought Mackenzie Bowell into not too pleasant positions before the public, so it would seem to be the case in this. On the 3rd of August Jamieson visited Napanee, and has, we understand, been on several other occasions in town. What his mission was no one at the time suspected, unless it was to make better acquaintance with those with whom he and his father-in-law's family were soon to become related to. Subsequent events show that he was here on other business and, it is conjectured, that of, if possible, breaking up the engagement.

All continued well up to Thursday night, when Mr. Bowell paid a visit to Napanee, having received a letter from his daughter in which was the question, "why go to Napanee for a wife, where all the women are bad" or "fast"—something to that effect if not just those words. The father was met at the station by his son C. J., and together they visited the Huffman House, read the letter over, and the son decided that the father should go on and pay no attention to the epistle—do just as though it had not been received. Mr. Bowell visited his intended and showed her the letter, and it was talked over, but nothing of moment transpired. The two parted the best of friends, Mrs. Stevenson fully expecting all was still well. Mr. Bowell was to go to Belleville, consult with his family, and return the next day.

Bowell did not return the next day, and Mrs. Stevenson's surprise can be better imagined than described when we state that on Saturday morning she received a letter from Mr. Bowell to the effect that the marriage must be declared off, as there were rumors afloat regarding Mrs. Stevenson which, whether true or untrue, were sufficient to break up the engagement. No opportunity was given Mrs. Stevenson to explain; she was cut off abruptly. The hitherto overheated love of the minister of the crown had become cooled, whether willingly or unwillingly it is hard to say. He had gone to the home of his children in Belleville, and on Friday had evidently put in a hard day's work with his friends—the latter coming out best in the struggle.

This was naturally very serious news for Mrs. Stevenson. It prostrated her, and on Saturday she took to her bed, where she was confined up to well on in the day of Monday. Even at this writing we understand she is not at all well, and it is difficult to say just what effect he unbecoming action of Bowell will have upon her.

It is quite evident that had it not been for the interference of outsiders, to-day Mr Bowell and Mrs Stevenson would have been man and wife.

In brief, the history of the affair up to this time was thus: Love at first sight; proposition at second meeting; on the third meeting fixing of the day; with a very abrupt breaking off of the engagement inside a few weeks.

But this is not all. As though to add insult to injury, Mr. Bowell has since kept his mouth closed, and allowed damaging reports to be given currency as to the anand other, but declining it "for reasons which Mrs. E. Stevenson could give if she chose," and with the same mail was a third letter, cancelling the services of the Archdeacon. In the face of these facts it is cruel for a man to endeavor to throw all the blame on a woman.

Since the above was in type we notice the following in the Ottawa Free Press of the 15th: "Hon Mr Bowell, in conversation with a Free Press reporter to-day, gave the statement of his alleged engagement a denial." In reply, and to further substantiate what we have before said, we would just say that Mr. Bowell personally wrote Archdeacon Bedford-Jones, asking him to officiate at the marriage of himself and Mrs Stevenson, to which the clergyman replied, saying that he would be happy to do so and complimenting him upon his good fortune. Then, in addition, Mr. Bowell, when joked about the affair by various persons in town, did not deny that it was to take place. The wedding attire was being made by Messrs. Robinson & Co. and Hooper & Doxsee and the order for the cake was given to Mr. W. H. Davis.

When the Archdeacon received the letter from Mr. Bowell on Saturday notifying him that his services would not be required he was much taken aback and wrote Mr. Bowell an indignant letter.

Bowell has acted very childish throughout this affair. He was love stricken at first sight, and has broken off the marriage in schoolboy fashion. It would appear as though his word in social matters was no more to be relied upon than it is in political. Had he acted more manly, a woman would have been saved ridicule, and the homes of families undisturbed.

Just what action may be taken in the premises we are not in a position to say. Mrs. Stevenson feels her position very keenly, but being of a weak, nervous temperament, is not inclined to go into court. Her friends, however, say that such must be done—that Bowell must be made to smart severely for his shameful conduct. It is hoped in the interest of womanhood such will be the case. He may go away on his British Columbia trip with the idea that the affair will all blow over before his return, but upon his arrival in Ontario again he may find it different.

Who Is Mrs. Stevenson?

To residents of this section it is hardly necessary to reply to this query, but to outsiders it may be. She is a widow of forty summers, accomplished and pleasing in her manner. She was born at Bath, and in 1869 married Mr. E. S. D. Stevenson, third son of the late Hon. Jno. Stevenson, well and favorably known to the older residents in these counties. Mr. Ed. Stevenson will be known to the older members of the Commons and Senate when we state that for some time he was private secretary to his father in the Legislative Assembly. He was a graduate of Toronto University and had a brilliant career before him. Death, however, cut him off just as he was about entering life in real earnest. As the issue of the marriage there is a son about 17 years old, who resides with his mother on Bridge street. Dame Rumor has been very cruel with Mrs. Stevenson since the breaking up of the marriage. One of the most cruel thrusts is that the affair was of her own seeking, and that it was Bowell's money she was after. This is untrue. Since the death of her husband Mrs. Stevenson has resided in her own house in this place, her mother living with her. Of means she has ample to keep her. She has an interest in the Stevenson estate, which includes the property here and the piano works at Kingston. Comfortable and happy, and moving in good society in Napanee, she had no occasion to seek a change in life.

An your odds an ends set right,
Ye'll be a pleasant sight

The hands that made thee forth tae stand

Editor of THE EXPRESS

DEAR SIR,—I attended most of the shows in this county this year and was much delighted with the very creditable show of stock. It is quite evident that the people are becoming more alive to the fact that it is best to raise good animals. In grading [up] it is however quite evident that the farmers in this section are trying an impossibility, viz; trying to concentrate in one animal the three qualities of roadster, farm and heavy draught—three distinct types; each requiring a peculiar form and very different from the other. In breeding for farm use, or the foreign market, care must be had as as to the article demanded. For carriage and roadsters we want the thoroughbred sire, of which "War Cry" is a fair type of the former and "Stanton Jr." or "Highland Boy" of the latter. For the farm, either the Percheron or Suffolk Punch—compact, smooth-turned, "2story-on-the-ground" horses, which can draw a moderate load or take you to market without the risk of dying of old age before you get there. "Young Romulus" is a good specimen.

For heavy draught the Clydesdale and shire horses are the favorites, having great bone and muscle, with good walking action, of which "Prince Royal," "Can Grant" and "Western Lad" are good types. Such horses are not in very great demand for home use but find ready sale at good prices in the American market.

There is too much jealousy shown on the part of the owners of Clydesdale throughout

Board of Education.

Sept. 24.—A special meeting of the board was held this evening, all the members being present except Mr. Hall.

The chairman presiding stated that the object of calling the meeting was for the purpose of considering the request of Mr. Fessenden, asking to be released from his engagement with the board, in consequence of his having been tendered the position of headmaster of the Perth collegiate institute; and also the resignation of Mr. Martin, the latter to take effect Oct. 31, 1888.

Mr. Martin's resignation was accepted, and the committee on teachers instructed to procure a teacher to fill the vacancy.

Mr. Fessenden's request was not granted.

The monthly meeting was held in council chamber on Tuesday evening. Members present—J. A. Sexsmith, chairman; Wagar, Bradish, Morden, Hanley, Coxall, Preston and Carlisle.

Minutes of last meeting read and confirmed.

The committee to whom was referred the matter of salaries to janitors made a verbal report, and also a recommendation relative to a claim made by Mr. Pringle,—an allowance for rent.

Upon motion of Mr. Preston, seconded by Mr. Hanley, the report was referred back to the committee to report more fully in writing respecting both matters at next meeting.

Reports of Messrs. Bowerman and Black received and read, and on motion were ordered to be laid on the table.

Moved by Mr. Preston, seconded by Mr. Coxall, that the teachers in the public schools keep a record of all cases of corporal punishment inflicted and the reasons, and that a book be provided for that purpose. Carried.

An application from Miss N. L. Grange, asking for an increase of salary, was read.

Moved by Mr. Morden, seconded by Mr. Coxall, that the board cannot entertain any applications looking to an increase of salary until midsummer vacation, and the secretary was instructed to inform Miss Grange accordingly. Carried.

The account of T. S. Henry was ordered to be returned to him, to be made out separately, and then referred to the respective committees with power to act.

Presbytery of Kingston.

A meeting of this Presbytery, adjourned from the 17th ult., was held in the Presbyterian Church here on Tuesday, the 9th inst. There was a good attendance of members.

The principal items of business were the consideration of the Rev'd T. S. Chambers resignation of the pastoral charge of Wolfe Island, and also his demission of the office of Presbytery clerk—an office which he has held for a period of nearly twenty-three years. These resignations were caused by the necessity of the removal to a warmer climate on account of the health of a member of the family.

There was also to be considered a call from the congregation of Wallacetown, in the Presbytery of London, Ont., in favor of the Revd Donald Kelso, minister of Roslin and Thurlow.

The resignations of Mr. Chambers were accepted with much regret, both on the part of the Presbytery and the congregation of Wolfe Island, but in the circumstances nothing else could be done.

Mr. Young was appointed clerk pro tempore—the appointment of a permanent clerk having been postponed till the next regular quarterly meeting in December.

The Rev. Mr. Kelso having signified his acceptance of the call presented to him, his translation was agreed to, and he was instructed to await the orders of the Presbytery of London, for induction into his new charge.

After attending to a few matters of ordinary routine business, of no interest to the general public, the Presbytery adjourned to meet again in the city of Belleville, and within St. Andrew's Church there, on the 17th of December next at 7.30 o'clock p. m.

N. T. & Q. R. Notes.

Affairs around the tidy station of the N. T. & Q. R. denote that winter is coming. The flowers have been taken in and "embanking" done where necessary.

The head offices have been re-modelled somewhat. Mr Sherwood now has his office a little to the west of his old room. His late desk-room has been thrown into the general office. Other minor improvements have been made, giving the place a pleasing and comfortable appearance.

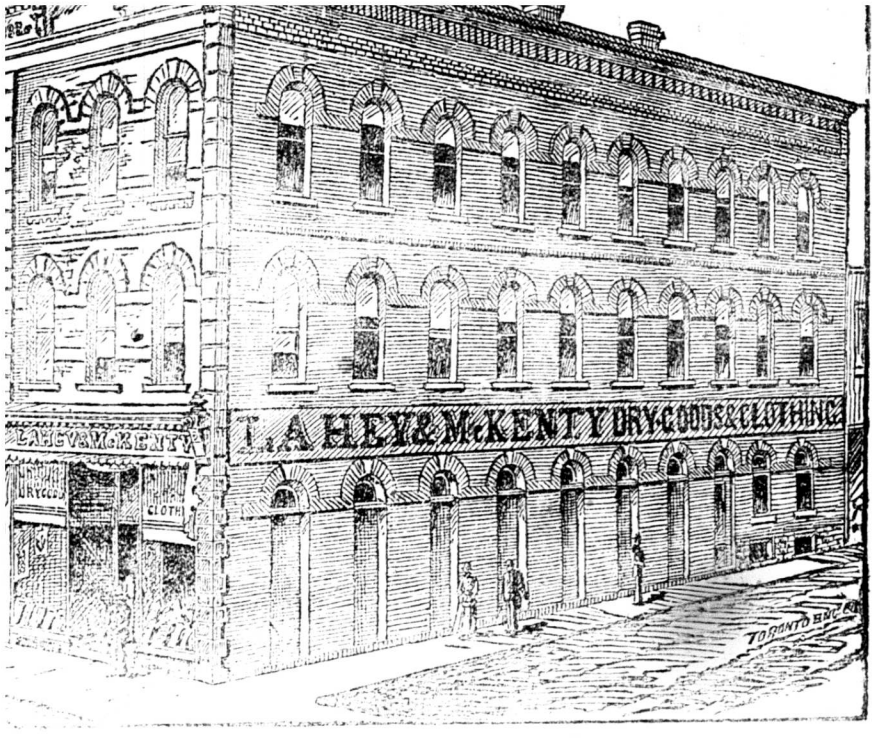
The arbitration between the company and Robt Adair, for his land at Tamworth and damages has been held. Instead of getting the $300 he asked for, Mr Adair receives $75 for about a fifth of an acre of his property and is to be allowed to remove his barn. Each to pay half the costs of arbitration.

For some little time past Messrs W. R. Aylsworth and H. B. Sherwood have been negotiating for the right of way for the Tweed extension. A considerable portion has been purchased. This week they were out there on the same mission.

The company is pushing the work of the extension forward with vigor. Already the road is graded through the farms of Messrs Milligan, Miller and Armstrong, and men are now working on Mr Burns' lot. Tuesday a representative of the Dominion bridge company went out to Tamworth to superintend the construction of the bridge across the Salmon river. It will be an A 1 structure, 67 ft span, of eighteen tons weight, with 'butments of stone.

The Bear Hunt

—The Kingston News gives the following additional particulars regarding the bear hunt at Wilton:—This morning, Mr. O. C. Storms, of Wilton, arrived in the city with the carcas of a black bear, which he and four others killed about four o'clock this morning. The animal is a large one and will weigh near 400 pounds. For some time past it has been annoying the residents around Wilton and fearing it would do some harm, it was decided by Mr. Sweet and Mr. Geo. Babock and others to hunt Bruin. They watched for him all last night and at four o'clock their efforts were rewarded, when by the aid of the lantern they trailed him. A spaniel dog took the lead and the party followed. Babcock carried a lantern and a revolver. Every time he came close to the animal he would fire. Suddenly the bear stopped and Babcock was so close that he run against the brute and quick as lightning the bear was on top. He buried his teeth in Babcock's side, and then in his thigh and leg, lacerating the flesh badly. The rest of the party were afraid to fire for fear of shooting Babcock instead of the bear. The spaniel when he saw Babcock down rushed at the bear and bit so savagely about the hind legs that Bruin was forced to leave his victim alone, and turn his attention to the dog. This gave the rest of the party an opportunity and they soon killed the big fellow. Babcock's injuries though painful will not result fatally. He owes his life to the spaniel, but the poor dog was itself shot



RINNIE BLOCK.

...Since entering their premises the popular [illegible] men have had a number of little additions made to the [illegible] arrangements of the store, and have filled it up with an excellent stock of general goods. As we pointed out at the time we gave an extended description of the block, Messrs Lahey & McKenty have divided their business into departments. Staples, tweeds and gents' furnishings occupy the east side; on the west side are dress goods, silks, fancy goods, corsets, prints, cretonnes, hosiery, gloves, etc. At the rear is the carpet, lace curtain and oil cloth department. Down-stairs is the ready made clothing and hat and cap department, while on the second floor is the dress and mantle making room presided over by Miss Barrett. Another department is that of ordered clothing, to which they are devoting considerable attention. Messrs. Lahey & McKenty have their premises fitted up with the view of expeditiously waiting upon customers, and have increased their business considerably since moving.

He owes his life to the spaniel, but the poor dog was itself shot by one of the bullets. Mr Storms says that he will endeavor to save the spaniel's life if possible. He was offered twelve dollars for the skin of the bear.

Suit Against Rev S Card

—Our former townsman, Rev. S. Card, is not without his troubles and trials. He is being sued on account of malicious prosecution. A year ago Lucy McKewin, of North Gower, died in Watertown under sad circumstances. Her remains were taken to North Gower for burial, and an action began against an old gentleman named Andrews charged with being the girl's betrayer. Rev. Mr. Card, pastor of the church of which Andrews was a member, began a church investigation. Joel B. Beaman, Merrickville, uncle of the dead girl, who also belonged to Card's church, was found guilty of the offence charged against Andrews, and was expelled. Beaman applied for another trial which was refused, and then Beaman began a suit at law. Messrs. John K. Lavell, Smith's Falls, and Joel B. Beaman, Merrickville, visited Watertown to gather testimony towards proving Beaman's case. It appears that the elder sister of the deceased girl told that a guilty uncle had been supplying her with money, and upon the death of Lucy, she sent a telegram to the uncle to come to Watertown. Beaman came. This evidence was gleaned together with other points. The case was called in court but adjourned until the next Brockville assizes. B. B. Britton, Q.C., has been retained for the prosecution and Mr. J. Jamieson, M. P., brother of our townsman, Mr. T. Jamieson, for the defence.

The A O U W Concert

—The Napanee Workmen have succeeded in securing excellent talent for their concert to take place in the opera house on Friday evening, Nov. 2nd, viz: Miss Annie Fralick of Kingston; Jas. Fax, of Toronto; Miss Burdette, of Belleville, and Mr. and Mrs Bignell, of Guelph. The two first named have been before Napanee audiences and met with much favor, so that it is needless to quote opinions regarding them. Of Miss Burdette, the Toronto Saturday Night says:—"Miss Burdette, of [illegible], made her first appearance in Toronto and speedily won her way into the good graces of the audience. She has a [illegible] contralto voice and fine presence." Mrs Bignell: The Mercury says: "Mrs Bignell was greeted with applause on her appearance. She sang Kerry Dance with [illegible] feeling. Her finely modulated voice appeared to advantage in 'Waiting.'" Admission 35c; no extra charge for reserved seats.

Lapum's Misconduct

—Judge Wilkison presided at the sittings of the Division Court held here on Wednesday. The only case that attracted attention was that of McKay and Lapum, in which John A. McKay sued E. S. Lapum for twenty seven yards of flannel taken from the plaintiff's shop by the defendant. The evidence showed that Lapum knew that he was doing wrong when he took the goods, and the Judge took him to task very severely. In giving judgment against the defendant he said "Mr. Lapum was a guilty party. He admits that he was watching for an opportunity to get McKay absent in order to get the flannel. The whole transaction is discreditable to Mr. Lapum. Lapum [illegible] arrangements which he must have known to be illegal to take the property [illegible] party."

CHAPTER XLIII.—"LET ME BE YOUR SERVANT."

Valentine Belfield did not go to the Great Western Hotel after he left the house in Lisson Grove. He was too deeply agitated to go quietly back to his hotel, and eat a good supper and drink a bottle of wine and go to bed and rest. He knew that sleep was impossible, unless he could bring it about by sheer fatigue, as he had done when he walked from the Abbey to Bideford and had slept the sleep of exhaustion in the bottom of the little sailing boat. His only chance to-night was to walk down the devil of restlessness that was in him; so he turned his face northward and walked to Hampstead, and then struck off towards Finchley and Hendon, and roamed about among fields and lanes all night, and at seven o'clock, breakfasted at a little public-house by the side of a canal, somewhere between Finchley-road and Child's Hill. It was a house chiefly affected by bargemen, and nobody took any particular notice of him, the barmaid merely remarking that in all probabillty he was a swell who had been on the drink last night, and had been walking about to sober himself. He was sober enough this morning evidently, and was proof against all the barmaid's blandishments, though she had taken the trouble to take her hair out of papers before she carried him his breakfast of eggs and bacon and strong tea.

He had eaten nothing yesterday except the dainty little plate of bread and butter supplied by Madge, and he was faint and sick from the unaccustomed fast.

He fell asleep by the fire in the public-house parlour, slept through the entrances and exits of several relays of bargemen, slept amidst the odour of beer and the jingle of pewter pots, dozed on till the afternoon, and then paid his score and went away. He made his way across the fields to the Edgware-road, and thence to Lisson Grove, where he went into a slopseller's shop and bought a complete suit of such clothes as are worn by the lower order of working men—an Oxford shirt, corduroy trousers, fustian jacket, and hob-nailed boots. He changed his clothes on the premises, and reappeared in Lisson Grove in corduroy and fustian, leaving his own things to be kept till called for. The shopman wondered not a little at this transformation.

"It's a lark," answered Mr. Belfield, as he walked out of the shop.

"Well, I must say that I never laid eyes on a less larky looking gent to be up to such a move as that," said the young Israelite, to his fellow shopman, as he put Mr. Belfield's clothes away.

"There's a lady at the bottom of it, I make no doubt, Benjamin," replied the other, dismissing the subject, which remark was more accurate than speculative observations are wont to be.

It was dusk when Mr. Belfield rang the bell at the Folorne Hope. Madge opened the door and did not recognise him, as he stood facing her silently; with his back to the light.

"What do you want, my good man?"

"I want to be your servant, as I told you last night."

Mr. Belfield, why are you still hanging about here?" cried Madge, in an agonized tone. "This is sheer madness.

"I believe it is next door to madness," as window-cleaners. To-night you can take a holiday, but on future evenings we can give you some penmanship to do for us, letters to charitable people who help us. What must we call you, by-the-bye? You have a second Christian name, I think?"

"Yes. I was christened John Valentine but I was always called by the second name, because my mother preferred it."

"Then here we will call you John."

She began to prepare the tea, as she had done on the previous evening, and two of the sisters came in to fetch the trays for their patients. One was an elderly woman, the other a girl of two-and-twenty, a pale gentle-looking creature, with a wistful expression in her large blue eyes.

Madge introduced Valentine to them as Mr. John, a person who in the outside world had been a gentleman, but who offered himself to them as a servant.

"If all the sisters approve, I think we may keep him here and find him very useful," she said. "In the meantime he will stay here for to-night, and he can help you both in carrying round the coal-scuttles after tea."

Sister Agnes, the fair girl, sat down to tea with Madge and Valentine. She had a slightly nervous manner, and spoke rarely but Valentine was interested in her appearance, and inquired her history by-and-bye-when she had gone back to her duties on the upper floor.

"Her's is a sad story. She belongs to very rich people, and three years ago her life was a round of gaiety. She fell in love with an army doctor, and her family were all opposed to the match, and made her break off her engagement. He went to Egypt and was killed in the Soudan. She heard of his death unexpectedly from her partner at a dance, and for six months afterwards she was out of her mind. When she recovered, nothing would induce her to resume her old life of fine clothes and parties, nothing would induce her to hear of another lover. She devotes her life to charitable work, and all the money her father gives her is given to the poor. He is very liberal to her, although he disapproves of her way of life. She spends only one day of every week in this house, but she works for us out of doors, going about the the streets at night, and talking to wretched women whom few girls of her age would have the courage to approach. That fragile looking woman has penetrated the darkest alleys about Clare Market, the most dangerous streets in Ratcliff Highway, where even the police go at the risk of their lives. She has never suffered any harm, has hardly ever been insulted by a coarse word. She has done more good than any other member of our sisterhood, although all have worked well."

"She can take your place when you have gone to the other side of the world, Madge."

Madge shook her head with a sweet, serious look, full of tenderness.

"I shall never leave my work, Mr. Belfield. I have given myself to it as much as if I had taken a vow. I am very sorry for you, I would do much to befriend you or to be of use to you, but I have put my hand to the plough, and I shall never take it away."

Valentine got up and began to pace the room fuming.

chosen to come there, and she had not denied him shelter. She had taken upon herself in some wise the responsibility of his existence, since she had spoken of him to the Sisters; and now she felt that his presence there would be a constant source of anxiety and mental disturbance. She would have to be perpetually on her guard, forever denying a love which was the strongest passion of her life. It had been in her despair at resigning him, that she had gone upon her mission to her mother. All that she had done for others had been the off shoot of her despairing love for him. And now he offered himself to her in honour, and she refused him.

"If I give way to his fancy he will forget all the past, and his repentance will become a mockery," she said to herself. "I cannot stand in the place of his dead wife. I cannot profit by his crime. How could I ever be at peace remembering that it was murder that set him free to be my husband?"

CHAPTER XLIV.—IS THERE NO BALM IN GILEAD?

The Coroner was a portly gentleman of sixty-five, who had fulfilled all the duties of a general practitioner in Chadford and the surrounding villages for upwards of thirty years, and who had retired on a comfortable fortune made partly by his profession, and partly by fortunate investments in modest little branches and loops of the great railway system, which had developed into important lines. He had bought for himself an estate of forty odd acres of excellent pasture land between the Chad and the shoulder of the moor, and he had built for himself one of those essentially Philistine houses, of the streaky bacon order of architecture, which are the delight of men who make their fortunes in country towns. Altogether, Mr. Mapleson was a very worthy person; and when the office of Coroner became vacant his name appeared at the head of the poll. Mr. Mapleson's study was a small square apartment, furnished with red morocco-bound books of reference, a whip rack, and a formidable row of boots, which imparted an odour of Day and Martin to the atmosphere. Into this somewhat prosaic chamber, Monsieur Lenotte, otherwise Markham, the detective, was ushered by the man-of-all-work, alias butler, on the morning of the discovery in the Abbey river; and in the briefest phraseology he told what had happened, and his own conclusions therefrom.

"You think it is a case of murder," said Mr. Mapleson, biting the end of his pen.

"It can be nothing else. There is a carpet rolled round the body, and fastened with a silk handkerchief. Nothing has been touched since the remains were lifted out of the water; the colours in the carpet are distinguishable, and the string of silk round it is evidently a large neck handkerchief. There can be very little doubt that the body was thrown into the water after death."

The remains are not in a condition to be identified, I conclude."

"No. Time and the river have done their work of destruction only too well. There may be only means of identification, rings and trinkets of some kind. The remains have not been touched more than was absolutely necessary in carrying them from the river to the dead-house, where they are waiting for the medical examination."

"And you are in a position to affirm that this is the body of Mrs. Belfield?"

"I am in a position to affirm as much, and I hope to be able to prove by circumstantial evidence that her husband murdered her, and threw her dead body into the river between midnight and morning on the 19th of August. But I will not trouble you with any further details. The inquest, which

"I want to be your servant, as I told you last night."

Mr. Belfield, why are you still hanging about here?" cried Madge, in an agonized tone. "This is sheer madness.

"I believe it is next door to madness," answered Valentine following her into the parlour, "but it is madness that only you can cure. There's no use in my going abroad Madge, without you. I should only carry my guilty conscience and my misery with me, go where I might—Africa, Asia, the North Pole—it would be all the same to me. There is no place so strange, no life so wild and full of danger, excitement, occupation, that would make me forget, so long as I were alone. You have the power to comfort me. You have the power to lay the ghost that haunts me. You alone can tell me that I have repented and have expiated my sin. You have the faith that moves mountains, and by your faith I may be saved. Leave me to myself and I shall perish invitably. There is no help, no cure, but through you."

"You are mad," she said. "Yes., it is all madness. I have a good work to do here and I cannot leave it."

"Let me stay here then, and work for you. That is what I have come for; to be your drudge, your slave; to be what Caliban was to Prospero. I am dressed for the part, you see. You will find how handy I can make myself, cleaning windows and scrubbing flag-stones, doing work that you and the sisters cannot do, with all your willingness to toil. And in bad cases, when a patient wants watching at night, I can do my part as a watch-dog. You don't know what I can be under your transforming power. Madge, I have no friend in the world but you."

"You have your mother, a nearer and dearer friend."

"No. To my mother my life has been a lie. She only is my friend who knows my sin and my repentance. Let me stay here, Madge, and when I leave the country, go with me as my guardian-angel and my wife. Test the truth of my repentance, if you will, before you trust me. See how changed a creature I have become. How all that is vilest in my nature has been purged out of it by the horrer of my secret sin. Test me to the uttermost as your servant, before you accept me as your husband."

Madge began to waver. He who was pleading to her knew not how urgently her own heart was pleading for him, how fondly she loved him even in his degradation, stained with the shedding of blood.

"I believe it would be for your own safety to leave England instantly," she said. "There is no knowing when danger may arise, but if you are bent upon staying in this house and helping us in our work, I will talk to the sisters and see what can be done. Our fortnightly committee meeting will be held to-morrow afternoon, and most of the sisters will be here. If they consent to your being employed here—as a servant—I have no objection. There is a little room on this floor at the end of the passage, which you might have as a bedroom. It is small and rather dark, but it is dry and well ventilated."

"Give me any den, any cell," said Valentine. "Do you think I care how I am lodged. I want to be near you, Madge. I wantto feel the support of your presence. That is all I ask.'

"You must not call me Madge here. I am Sister Margaret."

"You shall be Sister Margaret, until you are wife Margaret. And now order me about, let me begin my slavery. Give me any work there is to be done."

"I don't think there is anything you can do to-night, but you shall clean all the windows to-morrow, if you like. Our windows have always been an affliction to me. We have done our best, but women are not good you, I would do much to befriend you or to be of use to you, but I have put my hand to the plough, and I shall never take it away."

Valentine got up and began to pace the room. fuming.

"It is madness," he exclaimed; "a woman's craze. Only a woman would ever think of such a thing. Are there not hospitals for sick women?"

"There are hospitals for disease, but there are no hospitals for the weak and ailing, there are very few refuges for fainting sinners. There are plenty of orphanages for the spotless children, but there are few havens for the girls lost in the dawn of girlhood. Christ loved the innocent children and called them to his knees; but he had inexhaustible pity for the fallen women."

"So be it. You have set the ball rolling. You have begun the work. Others can carry it on."

"I will not leave it to others.

"You can continue your good work in the Antipodes. You will find sin in the new world as well as in the old. There is no colony so recently founded that Satan has not helped to people it. Come, Madge, be reasonable. Three years ago you spurned me because I dared to approach you as a seducer. You did well, and I deserved your contempt. Now I come to you in all honour; I offer you all I have to give—my name, my life, my fortune, such as it is. I am to inherit all my mother's property, and I shall not be a poor man. I come to you with a blemished life, stained with one hour of darkest sin. But I am not altogether vile. I have repented that fatal hour in the long agony of months. I shall repent it all my life. Only you can make that life tolerable; only you can heal my wounds. Be my wife, Madge; take me with all my sins."

She held out her hand to him as he stopped in his pacing to and fro, and they remained for some moments silent, with clasped hands, he looking down at her, his eyes kindling as he looked; she was very pale and her lips slightly tremulous.

"You love me, Madge," he said breathlessly; "you can forget all for my sake."

"I am very sorry for you," she answered softly, "but I have done with individual love. I have given my heart and life to my sorrowing sisters."

"It is a craze, Madge; I say again it is a craze."

"You have not seen the good done—you have not seen the altered faces. There are women now in happy honest homes whom we have picked up out of the gutter. If you were to see one young wife I know of, with her husband and her baby, you would not believe there had ever been a stain on her life. He took her, knowing what her past had been, and he has cherished her as a pearl of price. These are rare cases; but they are bright spots which cheer us and help us onward through many a dark night."

"Well, you are resolute, I suppose. You will go on helping strangers, and you will abandon me to my fate."

"I do not abandor you. I will do anything in my power to help you, short of sacrificing duty for your sake. I think you are very unwise to loiter here when you ought to be getting far away from England, losing your indentity in a strange world. Your wife's relations will not be satisfied for ever without certain knowledge of her fate. An investigation may be set on foot at any moment, and the truth may be brought to light. You should be out of the way before that can happen."

"I tell you I do not value my life unless you will share it. I would rather stay here and clear windows, than riot in luxury at the Antipodes."

Madge answered nothing. She felt the hopelessness of the situation. He had and I hope to be able to prove by circumstantial evidence that her husband murdered her, and threw her dead body into the river between midnight and morning on the 19th of August. But I will not trouble you with any further details. The inquest, which you are to hold to-morrow, will, I hope, be adjourned so as to give time for investigation. All I have done hitherto has been done in the dark. Many more details will doubtless come to light when the fact of the murder has been made public."

"Poor Lady Belfield," sighed the Coroner. "Do you know that I had the honour of attending the family at the Abbey for thirty years. I remember the present Lady Belfield when her husband brought her home as a bride. She was a lovely woman then. She is a lovely woman now, lovely in mind as well as in person. This business will break her heart."

"I fear it will go hard with her."

"She adores her younger son. I have seen her agony when he has been laid up with some childish ailment. All her world was in that sick bed. And to see him accused of murder! Mr. Markham, if you are deluded, if you have not ample justification for the course you are taking, you will be much to blame."

"My justification will be shown at the inquest. There must be an inquest."

"Yes, that is inevitable. I wish, with all my heart, Mr. Markham, you had never had that river dragged."

"Then you would have had an undetected murderer in your midst."

"Better that perhaps, than that a good woman's heart should be broken."

It was a quality of Lady Belfield's character to evoke strong sympathy from all who were brought in familiar contact with her.

Mr. Melnotte had a fly waiting for him at the Coroner's door, and drove straight to the nearest magistrate, from whom, after an interview of some length, he obtained a warrant for the arrest of Valentine Belfield on a suspicion of murder. With the county magistrate, as with the coroner, Melnotte found that sympathy with Lady Belfield was stronger than the abstract love of justice. He only just succeeded in getting the warrant signed in time for him to catch the next train for Exeter.

He was at Paddington at dusk, and went at once to the Great Western Hotel, where he enquired for Mr. Belfield

Nothing had been seen of that gentleman except his luggage. That had been brought by a Great Western porter two evenings before, with an intimation that Mr. Belfield was coming on to the hotel soon after; but nothing more had been heard of him. Three large portmanteaux, a gun case, a roll of rugs and coats, and a hat-box, marked V. B., were stacked in the hall, pending the arrival of the owner.

"Does Mr. Belfield usually stay here when he comes to town?" asked the detective.

"Yes, for a night or two at a time. He is one of our old customers," replied the manager.

Mr. Melnotte was at fault. That Valentine Belfield should have brought all that luggage to London and then left England without it, seemed unlikely. No purpose could have been served by bringing the luggage unless for his use. To bring it to London and abandon it at an hotel, could in no manner assist him in his flight, or tend to the mystification of his pursuers. The only explanation seemed that he had left his property at the hotel while he remained in a state of uncertainty as to his future course. He might be knocking about London, hesitating as to whither he should bend his steps.

That he was in hiding anywhere was unlikely, since he could as yet have no more cause for fear than he had had at any time since the commission of his crime. Arguing with himself thus, Mr. Melnotte supposed that he would have very little difficulty in putting his hand upon the missing man. He went straight from the Great Western to Scotland Yard, secured an assistant official, engaged a hansom by the hour, and started upon his quest.

"London is a big place, Redway," he said, "but the big London is only an aggregate of little Londons. Each man has his own peculiar metropolis, which is generally no bigger than a moderate-sized country town. Now I take it that Mr. Belfield's London is bounded on the West by Tattersall's, and on the East by the Criterion, on the South by Pall Mall, and by Oxford-street on the North. If we don't find him within those limits we must look for him at Liverpool, Southampton, or Plymouth,"

This was on the way to the Badminton, where Mr. Melnotte alighted and interviewed the porter. Mr. Belfield has not been seem there for six months.

"Not since Lord St. Austell's 'oss Postcard, lost the Great Ebor," said the porter, who dated most events by the Racing Calendar.

From the Badminton, Melnotte drove to the Argus, hard by.

Here again Mr. Belfield had not been seen for months.

Melnotte drove westward, and contrived to see one of the men at Tattersall's, though the yard was shut.

No tidings of Mr. Belfield.

"That'll do for to-night, Redway," said Melnotte, considerable disconcerted. I'll drive you back to the Yard, andthen I'll go and dine and turn in for the night. If Mr. Belfield had been knocking about town in an open, easy-going manner, I believve I should have heard of him at one of those places. So I am disposed to think he has taken the alarm and is trying to get out of the country, I hardly think he can have got clear off yet, but I shall set the wires at work again before I eat my chop.

Mr. Melnotte did set the wires at work to a considerable extent, just before the closing of the chief telegraph office. He telegraphed to all the ports from which a man seeking to escape from justice was likely to attempt a start, and took measures to secure attention for the fugitive.

He was up and about by times next morning, saw Mr. Belfield's tailor, took a stroll and an early cigar in the neighbourhood of Hyde Park Corner, hung about Tattersall's for an hour, looked in at a famous spurrier's in Piccadilly and a fashionable maker of hunting boots in Bond-street, and before eleven o'clock had satisfied himself that Mr. Belfield had not been seen at the West End of London since the previous summer.

The question to be solved was what had become of Mr. Belfield after he arrived at Paddington.

. . . . . .

In such a town as Chadford, the finding of a body in the Abbey river and the notice of an impending inquest at the Ring of Bells tavern in Little George-street, were not likely to remain unknown to the inhabitants. Before Mr. Melnotte had gone far upon his journey to London, everybody in Chadford knew that a body was lying in the dead-house, and that an inquest was to be held upon the following afternoon.

Melnotte had imposed silence upon the men who dragged the river, and yet it was known somehow that there were appearances about the body that pointed to foul play rather than accidental drowning, while there were those who declared that the murdered corpse was that of the missing Mrs. Belfield.

Mr. Rockstone was one of the first to hear of the event which everybody in Chadford was talking about. He came out of the house of a sick parishioner, where all was is of your mother I have been thinking, Adrian, since I heard of this discovery. How will it affect her?"

"How can it affect her? I cannot see——" Adrian began helplessly.

"If it is found that there has been foul play."

"Why foul play? Should this body be identified as that of Mrs Belfield, the inference will be that she drowned herself."

"The people in Cladford are talking of something more terrible than that. There is a rumour that circumstances point to the idea of murder. Adrian, I must speak plainly," said the Vicar, with undisguised grief. "Suspicion points to your brother as the murderer. It is of your mother I think. What can you or I do to help her to bear the blow?"

"Nothing, I fear. She adores Valentine. If any evil befall him, it will kill her."

"You will do all you can to keep idle rumours from her, and yet to prepare her for anything that may happen to-morrow. Where is your brother?"

"In London, I believe."

"You do not even know his whereabouts?"

"No. He left here with the idea of going abroad—perhaps to Africa, or South America. It was not his own fancy. My mother and I were anxious about his health and spirits, and urged him to travel. He has not written to me since he left."

"That is unlucky. He ought to be here, to face any difficulty that may arise to-morrow."

Adrian was silent. To him, who knew all, the one hope was that his brother might have left the country for ever.

Well, my dear Adrian," said the Vicar quietly, "we must wait and see what to-morrow may bring forth. I think you know that you may count upon me to do anything that lies within the compass of my will or my strength. Would to God I could see my way to being useful to you and your dear mother I shrink from asking you questions, because I feel I am on delicate ground; but if—if you knew anything that could assure me of the falsehood of these rumours—if, for instance, you had heard of your sister-in-law since her supposed elopement——"

"I have heard nothing of her. It is better that I should answer no questions till to-morrow. I suppose I shall be called at the inquest?"

"I conclude so—if there is sufficient ground for identifying the body with your sister-in-law."

"Then I will keep my own counsel till I am before the Coroner."

Mr. Rockstone left Sir Adrian soon after this, somewhat mystified by his calmness.

OVERBOARD IN THE RAPIDS.

Charles A. Percy Goes Through The Niagara Whirlpool.

Charles A. Percy came very near making a failure the other afternoon of his trip from the Maid of the Mist landing to Toronto by way of the whirlpool and the Niagara rapids. Percy got only as far Lewiston, and had an unexpected experience which nearly cost him his life. At 4.15 George Cheshire, H. G. Richardson, and William Lahey shoved the boat out into the river. It contained 800 pounds of ballast, and a 70 pound iron weight was used as a drag. Percy rowed to the centre of the stream, and at 4:20 fastened his oars and crawled into a hammock in the rear compartment of the boat. At 4:26 the craft passed under the cantilever and railway suspension bridges, going very rapidly and turning around in the eddies in a dizzy way. A few seconds later it struck the first great wave of the rapids. A cry of horror went up from the spectators on the lower bank when the craft spun

HOMELY COUNSEL.

It isn't worth while to fret, dear,
To walk as behind a hearse;
No matter how vexing things may be,
They easily might be worse;
And the time you spend complaining
And groaning about the load,
Would better be given to going on
And pressing along the road.

I've trodden the hill myself, dear;
'Tis the tripping tongue can preach;
But though silence is sometimes golden,
child,
As oft there is grace in speech.
And I see from my higher level,
'Tis less the path than the pace
That wearies the back and dims the eye
And writes the lines on the face.

There are vexing cares enough, dear;
And to spare, when all is told;
And love must mourn its losses,
And the cheek's soft bloom grow old;
But the spell of the craven spirit
Turns blessing into curse,
While the bold heart meets the trouble
That easily might be worse.

So smile at each disaster
That will presently pass away,
And believe a bright to-morrow
Will follow the dark to-day.
There's nothing gained by fretting;
Gather your strength anew,
And step by step go onward, dear,
Let the skies be grey or blue,

Margaret E. Sangster.

WHEN JIM WAS DEAD.

When Jim was dead,
"Hit sarved him right," the nabors sed,
An' 'bused him fer the life he'd led,
An' him a-lying thar at rest
With not a rose upon his breast!
Ah! menny cruel words they sed
When Jim was dead.

"Jes' killed hisself," "Too mean ter live,"
They didn't hav' one word ter give
Of comfort as they hovered near
An' gazed on Jim a-lying there!
"Thar ain't no use ter talk," they said,
"He's better dead!"

But suddenly the room growed still,
While God's white sunshine seemed ter fill
The dark place with a gleam of life,
An' o'er the dead she bent—Jim's wife!
An' with her lips close—close to his,
As tho' he knew an' felt the kiss,
She sobbed—a touchin' sight ter see—
"Ah! Jim was always good ter me!"

I tell you when that cum to light
It kinder set the dead man right;
An' round the weepin' woman they
Throwed kindly arms of love that day,
And mingled with her own they shed
The tenderest tears—when Jim was dead.

murdered corpse was that of the missing Mrs. Belfield.

Mr. Rockstone was one of the first to hear of the event which everybody in Chadford was talking about. He came out of the house of a sick parishioner, where all was quiet and shadow, into the bright winter sunlight, to find a group of townspeople standing in front of the sadler's shop in earnest conversation. From them he heard what had been found in the Abbey river.

His heart turned to lead as he listened. His mind had not been free from anxiety about Valentine's wife. He had been too delicate to question Lady Belfield or her sons, but he had wondered at the prevailing ignorance about the runaway wife's fate. When a woman elopes with a lover, there are generally those who know where she has gone, and who report and criticise her movements; but in this case no one had heard of the fugitive, no one knew where she was hiding her dishonoured existence. And now this finding of the corpse in the river pointed at fearful issues—at the best, suicide; at the worst, murder. He thought of Lady Belfield's agony when the talk of the town should reach her; and it must reach her very soon. In twenty-four hours every fact connected with the disfigured remains yonder must be brought to light, published to the world, discussed and commented upon in a tavern parlour. Friendship and love would be powerless to keep that horror from her, powerless even to blunt the edge of that anguish.

There was a fly crawling down the High-street on its return from the station. The Vicar jumped into it and told the man to drive to the Abbey at his sharpest pace. He wanted to find Sir Adrian before anything was known there. Andrew ushered him into the library, where Adrian was sitting at his desk surrounded with books and papers. He looked ill and careworn, the Vicar thought, but had too calm an air to have heard the evil news.

"My dear Rockstone, this is good of you," exclaimed Adrian, starting up and wheeling a comfortable arm chair towards the hearth, for his friend, and then seating himself opposite him. "It is an age since you have dropped in upon me so early. Tell me all your parish news, and your parish wants, if you have any."

"I cannot talk about the parish to-day. I have come to tell you of something terrible which has come to pass, and which may concern you and yours very nearly."

Adrian's face blanched to a ghastly pallor, and the hand clasping the arm of his chair trembled perceptibly.

"My God!" he gasped, "what is it?"

"A body has been found in the Abbey river—an hour ago."

"How found? Who found it?"

"The river was dragged this morning, I believe, at the instigation of Colonel Deverill's friend, Mr. Melnotte, who dropped his watch out of a boat a day or two ago, and wanted to have it found. A corpse has been found in the deep pool, near the cypress walk, and there is to be an inquest to-morrow.'

It was some moments before Adrian spoke, and then he asked quietly—

"Has the body been identified?"

"No, it is past all recognition, except by circumstantial evidence; but there is a rumour in Chadford, how arising I know not, that it is the body of your sister-in-law."

Again Adrian was silent. He would have given worlds to be able to speak freely, to confess all the hideous truth to this one staunch friend; but loyalty to his brother restrained him.

"My sister-in-law's fate is wrapped in darkness," he said, after a very long pause. "I do not understand why anyone should connect her with this drowned corpse."

"The reasons for such a suspicion will come to light at the inquest, I suppose. It cantilever and railway suspension bridges, going very rapidly and turning around in the eddies in a dizzy way. A few seconds later it struck the first great wave of the rapids. A cry of horror went up from the spectators on the lower bank when the craft spun around the waves and continued submerged. When it came to the surface it floated keel uppermost for quite a distance. After a terrible tossing, which lasted four minutes, the boat was tossed into the big maelstrom and floated easily around. The water was several feet lower than usual, and the boat grazed the rocks dangerously near, threatening every second to dash it to pieces, and end Percy's career.

The craft eddied in the whirlpool until 6.30, and then Dan Elsheimer and William Adams got it in comparatively still water, and towed it around the point into a current that would carry it to the Devil's Rapids. They narrowly escaped going along. Percy's boat grazed rock after rock, and was capsized repeatedly. He had gone but a little distance when the manhole cover was dashed to pieces by coming in contact with a rock, and the air chamber filled with water. Percy crawled out and clung to the craft for dear life. When near the Devil's Hole he became partly exhausted, and could no longer hold on, as the waves throw the boat about. Then he let go of the boat, and swam three miles further down stream, where at 7 30 that night Fisherman John Gillett picked him up more dead than alive. He was rowed rapidly to Waggoner's Hotel at Lewiston, and was with difficulty revived. When able to speak he told the story of his battle for life. In the upper rapids he was terribly tossed about, but the lower ones, he said, were still more terrible. Most of the trip was made in the dark.

"I seemed to be in a grave of foam," said Percy, "and I can't tell how I escaped with my life. It would have been bad enough if my boat had not been wrecked in the breakers, but that swim in the dark was terrible."

Soon afterward Percy said to a correspondent:

"I made this trip for the purpose of advertising my boat. I thought it would carry me through safely. I didn't expect it to show that the rapids were not dangerous, because I knew they were, but I had no notion that they were so bad as they are. The waves just knock you around until they almost pound the breath out of you, and then drop you into a watery well filled with a suffocating spray. I thanked God when I got to fairly clear water and the fisherman reached me when I was hardly able to swim another stroke. The water was low, and its a wonder I didn't get dashed to death on the rocks. I can't tell you the trip in detail, for I was so busy trying to help myself that I couldn't think of much else."

No bones are broken, but Percy's body is badly racked. His boat was lost, and will hardly be recovered.

An important engineering enterprise now in progress is a railroad in the Artic circle The Swedish and Norwegion railroad now building from Lulea, on the Gulf of Bothnia, to Loffoden, on the North Sea, is partly situated within the Artic circle, and is some 1,200 miles further north than any other railroad in Canada. An interesting meteorological fact stated in relation to this work is that the snowfall is found to be actually less than in some more southern latitudes, while the darkness of the long winter nights has been partly compensated by the light of the aurora. The object in view in constructing this line is to tap the enormous deposits of iron ore in the Gellivara Mountains, the approximate exhaustion of the ore in the Bilbao district rendering very desirable a new field of non-phosphoric ore suitable for steel rail making.

General Gordon's Fate.

The fate of General Gordon created an unpleasant sensation all over the world, there having been a prevalent impression that the Gladstone Ministry had been very reluctant to send to his relief. It will be interesting to note that a letter in the St. James' Gazette shows from the published memoirs of Mr. Forster that "Forster constantly urged the Ministry to fulfil the responsibilities they had incurred in the case of Gordon, and the resolve, tardily taken, to send the relief expedition to Khartoum, was 'largely due to the persistency with which Forster pressed them on the question.' In one of his urgent appeals against further delay he said, 'I believe everyone but the Prime Minister is already convinced of Gordon's danger, and I attribute his not being convinced to his wonderful power of persuasion. He can persuade most people of most things, and, above all, he can persuade himself of almost anything. When the expedition under Lord Wolseley at length started no one followed its advance with more anxiety than Mr. Forster, and when the fatal tidings came of the fall of Khartoum and the death of Gordon the blow fell on him 'with all the weight of a great personal affliction.' 'I can think of nothing but Gordon and the Soudan,' he notes in his diary the day after he first heard the sad news."

"ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH."

Moodie shook hands with the old hunter, and assured him that we should always be glad to see him. After this invitation, Brian became a frequent guest. He would sit and listen with delight to Moodie while he described to him elephant-hunting at the Cape; grasping his rifle in a determined manner, and whistling an encouraging air to his dogs. I asked him one evening what made him so fond of hunting.

"'Tis the excitement," he said; "it drowns thought, and I love to be alone. I am sorry for the creatures, too, for they are free and happy; yet I am led by an instinct I cannot restrain to kill them. Sometimes the sight of their dying agonies recalls painful feelings; and then I lay aside the gun, and do not hunt for days. But 'tis fine to be alone with God in the great woods—to watch the sunbeams stealing through the thick branches, the blue sky breaking in upon you in patches, and to know that all is bright and shiny above you, in spite of the gloom that surrounds you."

After a long pause, he continued, with much solemn feeling in his look and tone,

"I lived a life of folly for years, for I was respectably born and educated, and had seen something of the world, perhaps more than was good, before I left home for the woods; and from the teaching I had received from kind relatives and parents I should have known how to have conducted myself better. But, madam, if we associate long with the depraved and ignorant, we learn to become even worse than they. I felt deeply my degradation—felt that I had become the slave to low vice; and in order to emancipate myself from the hateful tyranny of evil passions, I did a very rash and foolish thing. I need not mention the manner in which I transgressed God's holy laws; all the neighbours know it, and must have told you long ago. I could have borne reproof, but they turned my sorrow into indecent jests, and, unable to bear their coarse ridicule, I made companions of my dogs and gun, and went forth into the wilderness. Hunting became a habit. I could no longer live without it, and it supplies the stimulant which I lost when I renounced the cursed whisky bottle.

"I remember the first hunting excursion I took alone in the forest. How sad and gloomy I felt! I thought that there was no creature in the world so miserable as myself. I was tired and hungry, and I sat down upon a fallen tree to rest. All was still as death around me, and I was fast sinking to sleep, when my attention was aroused by a long, wild cry. My dog, for I had not Chance then, and he's no hunter, pricked up his ears, but instead of answering with a bark of defiance, he crouched down, trembling, at my feet. "What does this mean?" I cried, and I cocked my rifle and sprang upon the log. The sound came nearer upon the wind. It was like the deep baying of a pack of hounds in full cry. Presently a noble deer rushed past. Presently a his trail—I see them now, like so many black devils—swept by a pack of ten or fifteen large, fierce wolves, with fiery eyes and bristling hair, and paws that seemed hardly to touch the ground in their eager haste. I thought not of danger, for, with their prey in view, I was safe; but I felt every nerve within me tremble for the fate of the poor deer. The wolves gained upon him at every bound. A close thicket intercepted his path, and, rendered desperate, he turned at bay. His nostrils were dilated, and his eyes seemed to send forth long streams of light. It was wonderful to term frosty, thus connected with the genial season of the year; the term is perfectly correct when applied to the Canadian spring, which, until the middle of May, is the most dismal season in the year)—he and John Monaghan took a rope, and the dog, and sallied forth to fetch the cow home. Moodie said that they should be back by six o'clock in the evening, and charged me to have something cooked for supper when they returned, as he doubted not their long walk in the sharp air would give them a good appetite. This was during the time that I was without a servant, and living in old Mrs. ——'s shanty.

The day was so bright and clear, and Katie was so full of frolic and play, rolling upon the floor, or toddling from chair to chair, that the day passed on without my feeling remarkably lonely. At length the evening drew nigh, and I began to expect my husband's return, and to think of the supper that I was to prepare for his reception. The red heifer that we had bought of Layton came lowing to the door to be milked; but I did not know how to milk in those days, and, besides this, I was terribly afraid of cattle. Yet, as I knew that milk would be required for the tea, I ran across the meadow to Mrs. Joe, and begged that one of her girls would be so kind as to milk for for me. My request was greeted with a rude burst of laughter from the whole set.

"If you can't milk," said Mrs. Joe, "its high time you should learn. My girls are above being helps."

"I would not ask you but as a great favour; I am afraid of cows."

"Afraid of cows! Lord bless the woman! A farmer's wife and afraid of cows!"

Here followed another laugh at my expense; and, indignant at the refusal of my first and last request, when they had all borrowed so much from me, I shut the inhospitable door, and returned home.

After many ineffectual attempts, I succeeded at last, and bore my half-pail of milk in triumph to the house. Yes! I felt prouder of that milk than many an author of the best thing he ever wrote, whether in verse or prose; and it was doubly sweet when I considered that I had procured it without being under any obligation to my ill-natured neighbours. I had learned a useful lesson of independence, to which in after-years I had often again to refer. I fed little Katie and put her to bed, made the hot cakes for tea, boiled the potatoes, and laid the ham, cut in nice slices, in the pan, ready to cook the moment I saw the men enter the meadow, and arranged the little room with scrupulous care and neatness. A glorious fire was blazing on the hearth, and everything was ready for their supper; and I began to look out anxiously for their arrival.

The night had closed in cold and foggy, and I could no longer distinguish any object at more than a few yards from the door. Bringing in as much wood as I thought would last me for several hours, I closed the door; and for the first time in my life I found myself at night in a house entirely alone. Then I began to ask myself a thousand torturing questions as to the reason of their unusual absence. Had they lost their way in the woods? Could they have fallen in with wolves (one of my early bugbears)? Could any fatal accident have befallen them? I started up, opened the door, held my breath, and listened. The little brook lifted up its voice in loud, hoarse wailing, or mocked, in its babbling to the stones, the sound of human voices. As it became head, and drank a deep draught of its icy waters. On returning to the house, I met near the door, old Brian the hunter, with a large fox dangling across his shoulder, and the dogs following at his heels.

"Why! Mrs. Moodie, what is the matter? You are early abroad this morning, and look dreadful ill. Is anything wrong at home? Is the baby or your husband sick?"

"Oh!" I cried, bursting into tears, "I fear he is killed by the wolves."

The man stared at me, as if he doubted the evidence of his senses, and well he might; but this one idea had taken such strong possession of my mind that I could admit no other. I then told him, as well as I could find words, the cause of my alarm, to which he listened very quietly and patiently.

"Set your heart at rest; your husband is safe. It is a long journey on foot to Mollineux, to one unacquainted with a blazed path in a bush road. They have staid all night at the black man's shanty, and you will see them back at noon."

I shook my head, and continued to weep.

"Well, now, in order to satisfy you, I will saddle my mare, and ride over to the nigger's, and bring you word as fast as I can."

I thanked him sincerely for his kindness, and returned, in somewhat better spirits, to the house. At ten o'clock my good messenger returned with the glad tidings that all was well.

The day before, when half the journey had been accomplished, John Monaghan let go the rope by which he led the cow, and she had broken away through the woods, and returned to her old master; and when they again reached his place, night had set in, and they were obliged to wait until the return of day. Moodie laughed heartily at all my fears; but indeed I found them no joke.

Brian's eldest son, a lad of fourteen, was not exactly an idiot, but what, in the old country, is very expressively termed by the poor people a "natural." He could feed and assist himself, had been taught imperfectly to read and write, and could go to and from the town on errands, and carry a message from one farm house to another; but he was a strange, wayward creature, and evidently inherited, in no small degree, his father's malady.

During the summer months he lived entirely in the woods, near his father's dwelling, only returning to obtain food, which was generally left for him in an outhouse. In the winter, driven home by the severity of the weather, he would sit for days together moping in the chimney-corner, without taking the least notice of what was passing around him. Brian never mentioned this boy—who had a strong, active figure, a handsome, but very inexpressive face—without a deep sigh; and I feel certain that half his own dejection was occasioned by the mental aberration of his child.

One day he sent the lad with a note to our house, to know if Moodie would purchase the half of an ox that he was going to kill. There happened to stand in the corner of the room an open wood box, into which several bushels of fine apples had been thrown; and, while Moodie was writing an answer to the note, the eyes of the idiot were fastened, as if by some magnetic influence, upon the apples. Knowing that Brian had a very fine orchard, I did not offer the boy any of the fruit. When the note was finished, I handed it to him. The lad grasped it mechanically, without removing his fixed gaze from the apples.

"Give that to your father, Tom."

The boy answered not—his ears, his eyes, his whole soul, were concentrated in the apples. Ten minutes elapsed, but he stood motionless, like a pointer at a dead set.

cepted his path, and, rendered desperate, he turned at bay. His nostrils were dilated, and his eyes seemed to send forth long streams of light. It was wonderful to witness the courage of the beast. How bravely he repelled the attacks of his deadly enemies, how gallantly he tossed them to the right and left, and spurned them from beneath his hoofs; yet all his struggles were useless, and he was quickly overcome and torn to pieces by his ravenous foes. At that moment he seemed more unfortunate even than myself, for I could not see in what manner he had deserved his fate. All this speed and energy, his courage and fortitude, had been exerted in vain. I had tried to destroy myself; but he, with every effort vigorously made for self-preservation, was doomed to meet the fate he dreaded! Is God just to his creatures?"

With this sentence on his lips, he started abruptly from his seat and left the house.

One day he found me painting some wild flowers, and was greatly interested in watching the progress I made in the group. Late in the afternoon of the following day he brought me a large bunch of splendid spring flowers.

"Draw these," said he; "I have been all the way to the ——— lake plains to find them for you."

Little Katie grasping them one by one, with infantile joy, kissed every blossom.

"These are God's pictures," said the hunter, "and the child, who is all nature, understands them in a minute. Is it not strange that these beautiful things are hid away in the wilderness, where no eyes but the birds of the air, and the wild beasts of the wood, and the insects that live upon them, ever see them? Does God provide, for the pleasure of such creatures, these flowers? Is His benevolence satisfied by the admiration of animals whom we have been taught to consider as having neither thought nor reflection? When I am alone in the forest, these thoughts puzzle me."

Knowing that to argue with Brian was only to call into action the slumbering fires of his fatal malady, I turned the conversation by asking him why he called his favorite dog Chance?

"I found him," he said, "forty miles back in the bush. He was a mere skeleton. At first I took him for a wolf, but the shape of his head undeceived me. I opened my wallet, and called him to me. He came slowly, stopping and wagging his tail at every step, and looking me wistfully in the face. I offered him a bit of dried venison, and he soon became friendly, and followed me home, and has never left me since. I called him Chance, after the manner I happened with him; and I would not part with him for twenty dollars."

Alas, for poor Chance! he had, unknown to his master, contracted a private liking for fresh mutton, and one night he killed no less than eight sheep that belonged to Mr. D———, on the front road; the culprit, who had been long suspected, was caught in the very act, and this mischance cost him his life. Brian was sad and gloomy for many weeks after his favorite's death.

"I would have restored the sheep fourfold," he said, "if he would but have spared the life of my dog."

My recollections of Brian seem more particularly to concentrate in the adventures of one night, when I happened to be left alone, for the first time since my arrival in Canada. I cannot now imagine how I could have been such a fool as to give way for four and-twenty hours to such childish fears; but so it was, and I will not disguise my weakness from my indulgent reader.

Moodie had bought a very fine cow of a black man, named Mollineux, for which he was to give twenty-seven dollars. The man lived twelve miles back in the woods; and one frosty spring day—(don't smile at the my breath, and listened. The little brook lifted up its voice in loud, hoarse wailing, or mocked, in its babbling to the stones, the sound of human voices. As it became later, my fears increased in proportion. I grew too superstitious and nervous to keep the door open. I not only closed it, but dragged a heavy box in front, for bolt there was none. Several ill-looking men had, during the day, asked their way to Toronto. I felt alarmed lest such rude wayfarers should come to-night and demand a lodging, and find me alone and unprotected. Once I thought of running across to Mrs. Joe, and asking her to let one of the girls stay with me until Moodie returned; but the way in which I had been repulsed in the evening prevented me from making a second appeal to their charity.

Hour after hour wore away, and the crowing of the cocks proclaimed midnight, and yet they came not. I had burnt out all my wood, and I dared not open the door to fetch in more. The candle was expiring in the socket, and I had not courage to go up into the loft and procure another before it went finally out. Cold, heart-weary, and faint, I sat and cried. Every now and then the furious barking of the dogs at the neighbouring farms, and the loud cackling of the geese upon our own, made me hope that they were coming; and then I listened till the beating of my own heart excluded all other sounds. Oh, that unwearied brook! how it sobbed and moaned like a fretful child;—what unreal terrors and fanciful illusions my too active mind conjured up, whilst listening to its mysterious tones!

Just as the moon rose, the howling of a pack of wolves, from the great swamp in our rear, filled the whole air. Their yells were answered by the barking of all the dogs in the vicinity, and the geese, unwilling to be behind hand in the general confusion, set up the most discordant screams. I had often heard, and even been amused, during the winter, particularly on thaw nights, with hearing the howls of these formidable wild beasts, but I had never before heard them alone, and when one dear to me was abroad amid their haunts. They were directly in the track that Moodie and Monaghan must have taken; and I now made no doubt that they had been attacked and killed on their return through the woods with the cow, and I wept and sobbed until the old grey dawn peered in upon me through the small dim window. I have passed many a long cheerless night, when my dear husband was away from me during the rebellion, and I was left in my forest home with five little children, and only an old Irish woman to draw and cut wood for my fire, and attend to the wants of the family, but that was the saddest and longest night I ever remember.

Just as the day broke my friends the wolves set up a parting benediction, so loud, and wild, and near to the house, that I was afraid lest they should break through the frail window, or come down the low, wide chimney, and rob me of my child. But their detestable howls died away in the distance, and the bright sun rose up and dispersed the wild horrors of the night, and I looked once more timidly around me. The sight of the table spread, and the uneaten supper, renewed my grief, for I could not divert myself of the idea that Moodie was dead. I opened the door, and stepped fourth into the pure air of the early day. A solemn and beautiful repose still hung like a veil over the face of Nature. The mists of night still rested upon the majestic woods, and not a sound but the flowing of the waters went up in the vast stillness. The earth had not yet raised her matin hymn to the throne of the Creator. Sad at heart, and weary and worn in spirit, I went down to the spring and washed my face and his whole soul, were concentrated in the apples. Ten minutes elapsed, but he stood motionless, like a pointer at a dead set.

"My good boy, you can go."

He did not stir.

"Is there anything you want?"

"I want," said the lad, without moving his eyes from the objects of his intense desire, and speaking in a slow, pointed manner, which ought to have been heard to be fully appreciated, "I want apples!"

"Oh, if that's all, take all you like."

The permission once obtained, the boy flung himself upon the box with the rapacity of a hawk upon its prey, after being long poised in the air to fix its certain aim; thrusting his hands to the right and left, in order to secure the finest specimens of the coveted fruit, scarcely allowing himself time to breathe until he had filled his old straw hat and all his pockets with apples. To help laughing was impossible; while this new Tom o' Bedlam darted from the house, and scampered across the field for dear life, as if afraid that we should pursue him to rob him of his prize.

It was during this winter that our friend Brian was left a fortune of three hundred pounds per annum; but it was necessary for him to return to his native country, in order to take possession of the property. This he positively refused to do; and when we remonstrated with him on the apparent imbecility of this resolution, he declared that he would not risk his life, in crossing the Atlantic twice, for twenty times that sum. What strange inconsistency was this, in a being who had three times attempted to take away that which he dreaded so much to lose accidentally!

I was much amused with an account which he gave me, in his quaint way, of an excursion he went upon with a botanist, to collect specimens of the plants and flowers of Upper Canada.

"It was a fine spring day, some ten years ago, and I was yoking my oxen to drag in some oats I had just sown, when a little, fat, punchy man, with a broad, red, good-natured face, and carrying a small black leathern wallet across his shoulder, called to me over the fence, and asked me if my name was Brian B———? I said 'Yes; what of that?"

"'Only you are the man I want to see. They tell me hat you are better acquainted with the woods than any person in these parts; and I will pay you anything in reason if you will be my guide for a few days.'

"'Where do you want to go?' said I.

"'Nowhere particular,' says he. 'I want to go here and there, in all directions, to collect plants and flowers.'

"That is still-hunting with a vengeance," thought I. 'To-day I must drag in my oats. If to-morrow will suit, we will be off.'

"'And your charge?' said he. 'I like to be certain of that.'

"'A dollar a day. My time and labour upon my farm, at this busy season, is worth more than that."

"True,' said he. "Well, I'll give you what you ask. At what time will you be ready to start?'

"'By daybreak, if you wish it.'

"Away he went; and by daylight next morning he was at my door, mounted upon a stout French pony. 'What are you going to do with that beast?' said I. 'Horses are of no use on the road that you and I are to travel. You had better leave him in my stable.'

"'I want him to carry my traps,' said he; it may be some days that we shall be absent.'

"I assured him that he must be his own beast of burthen, and carry his axe, and blanket, and wallet of food upon his own, back. The little body did not much relish this arrangement; but as there was no help for it, he very good-naturedly complied. Off we set, and soon climbed the steep at the back of your farm, and got upon—— ake plains. The woods were flush with flowers, and the little man grew into such an ecstasy, that at every fresh specimen he uttered a yell of joy, cut a caper in the air, and flung himself down upon them, as if he was drunk with delight. 'Oh, what treasures! what treasures!' he cried. 'I shall make my fortune!'

"It is seldom I laugh," quoth Brian, "but I could not help laughing at this odd little man; for it was not the beautiful blossoms, such as you delight to paint, that drew forth these exclamations, but the queer little plants which he had rummaged for at the roots of old trees, among the moss and long grass. He sat upon a decayed trunk, which lay in our path, I do believe for a long hour, making an oration over some greyish things, spotted with red, that grew upon it, which looked more like mould than plants, declaring himself repaid for all the trouble and expense he had been at, if it were only to obtain a sight of them. I gathered him a beautiful blossom of the lady's slipper; but he pushed it back w- I presented it to him, saying, 'Y- -en 'tis very fine. I have seen that -ten before; but these lichens are splendid.'

"The man had so little taste that I thought him a fool, and so I left him to talk to his dear plants, while I shot partridges for our supper. We spent six days in the woods, and the little man filled his tin case with all sorts of rubbish, as if he wilfully shut his eyes to the beautiful flowers, and chose only to admire ugly, insignificant plants that everybody else passes by without noticing, and which, often as I had been in the woods, I never had observed before. I never pursued a deer with such earnestness as he continued his hunt for what he called 'specimens.'

"When we came to the Cold Creek, which is pretty deep in place-, he was in such a hurry to get at some plants that grew under the water, that in reaching after them he lost his balance, and fell head over heels into the stream. He got a thorough ducking, and was in a terrible fright; but he held on to the flowers, which had caused the trouble, and thanked his stars that he had saved them, as well as his life. Well, he was an innocent man," continued Brian; "a very little made him happy, and at night he would sing and amuse himself like a child. He gave me ten dollars for my trouble, and I never saw him again; but I often think of him, when hunting in the woods that we wandered through together, and I pluck the wee plants that he used to admire, and wonder why he preferred them to the fine flowers."

When our resolution was formed to sell our farm, and take up our grant of land in the backwoods, no one was so earnest in trying to persuade us to give up this ruinous scheme as our friend Brian B——, who became quite eloquent in his description of the trials and sorrows that awaited us. During the last week of our stay in the township of H——, he visited us every evening, and never bade us good-night without a tear moistening his cheek. We parted with the hunter as with an old friend; and we never met again. His fate was a sad one. After we left that part of the country, he fell into a moping melancholy, which ended in self-destruction. But a kinder or warmer-hearted man, while he enjoyed the light of reason, has seldom crossed our path.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

Emperor William in Austria—Boulanger Looms up Again—The Whitechapel Murders.

As a result of William's visit royalty in Austria has been having times so tremendously big as to keep Europe breathless with amazement. The young Emperor's arrival at the Vienna station was enough by itself to turn the young man's head. There endless bands, of which one alone were 130 members, all playing numbered tunes. The Austrian E- -omplimentary platform, grand as -mperor was on the all the men of -ossible, backed up by ten Archd- -es of the royal family, including -es, who are great guns in that country, besides unli-ited important folk of lesser calibre. -he necessity, prescribed by -court etiquette, of kissing six -the Austrian Emperor, may have -ped young William's joy, but after that it was perfect.

The Boulanger boom is just now more interesting than ever and one well worth watching. All France is alarmed by Boulanger's quiet business way since his return, and men now in power make their uneasiness very plain. On his return Boulanger found 6,000 letters waiting for him, of which 2,000 were marked "confidential and important." He also found himself a much more popular man even than when he so mysteriously disappeared from public view. The Paris mob is hungering to see him. He has arranged his days in a most business-like fashion, keeps his own counsel, and there is nothing for the rest of the world to do but to watch and see how this most important political cat will jump when jumping time comes. For one thing we are informed he intends to be very quiet and unostentatious. No more driving to the Chamber of Deputies in on open landau through howling crowds, but in a closed carriage, with one horse; no fuss and as few speeches as possible. That's his scheme and if true this proves that the lucky adventurer feels very sure of his position and of the fickle Paris mob.

England is more than ever occupied with the Whitechapel murder scare, to the exclusion of everything else. Suggestions made have been endless, and the nonsense poured out on the subject has been unusually amusing. The papers print columns upon columns of letters from excited British matrons and citizens, each of whom wants something else done than is being done to catch the mysterious murderer. Each day sees fresh complaint made against the police. Any number of men want bloodhounds to be scattered all over the place to hunt for the murderer, as though a bloodhound could tell a murderer's scent from a parson's. One man, very much excited, insists that an intelligent bloodhound shall be kept in every police station, and that every policeman be instructed, when next he comes across a mutilated corpse on his beat, to whistle for a bloodhound at the same time he whistles for other constables, and then all shall follow along in a row behind the bloodhound's tail until they reach the criminal. A rather sensible suggestion is that all the police should be shod at night time with rubber, in order that the regular monotonous footfalls of the regulation police boot may not warn the murderer of approaching danger.

THE LAST BIBLICAL P- PUZZLE.

The Hittites, Who They W- Lived and What Ha- About -ere, Where They Been Discovered Them.

There was publi- -shed recently a brief notice of a despatch Bissinger at T- -rom United States Consul ery by G- -eirat, announcing the discovterestin- -rman explorers at Morash of inba- -g Hittite remains, consisting of black -lt blocks, in situ, covered with figures of men and animals. This announcement has attracted considerable attention among Oriental scholars and archæologists, and led to a renewal of inquiry in regard to the Hittites and the meaning of these latest discoveries. The stones at Merash undoubtedly are a part of the lower story of a Hittite palace or temple, these edifices being generally built of sculptured stones in their lower stories and of cedar above.

It is an interesting fact that while the Hittites were one of the most powerful nations of ancient times, their empire extending from the frontier of Egypt to the Ægean Sea, had great cities and were far advanced in civilization, and while they are frequently mentioned in the Old Testament, almost nothing has been known about them until within the last twenty years. It shows how a great nation, skilled in the arts of peace and formidable in war, the period of whose power was greater than that of Greece or Rome, may entirely disappear, the sites of its great cities be forgotten and it very existence almost pass out of the knowledge of mankind.

In 1812 Burckhardt discovered at Hanak some stones covered with Hittite hieroglyphics, but more than a century passed before enough of their remains were accumulated by archæologists to enable them to form any definite conception of the characteristics of the Hittites as a people or to construct even the barest outline of their history. Since 1870 very great progress has been made in accumulation of knowledge of the Hittites. Numerous discoveries have been made by Burton, Wright, Couder and by American missionaries and scholars, and several books have been published, besides numerous shorter articles in archæological and religious journals Dr. Williams Hayes Ward, of the New York Independent, was one of the earliest of Hittite scholars.

The Hittites were of Caucasian origin, coming from the North nearly 4000 years before Christ. In one respect they retained a peculiarity of the costume of their ancestors during the 3000 years of their dwelling in more Southern climes. They are represented as wearing shoes the toes of which were turned up in an exaggerated way, the survival of the snowshoe in their ancestral mountains. They were a hairless people, with long, thin mustaches, like those of the Chinese, light complexion, the head partly shaven, leaving a clear and unmistakable pig-tail. The eyes seem to have had a slight inclination, and the facial angle was oblique. A high, peaked cap was the most common style of Hittite head-dress, although square or round head-dresses are represented on some Hittite monuments, but are not as characteristic.

The Hittites were literary people and possessed a culture, an art and a script peculiar to themselves and plainly of indigenous origin. They were well advanced in the arts and had silver. Their bargain with the patriarch Abraham at Hebron was the earliest money transaction on record. They used silver as a standard of value, had balances for weighing it, and regular forms of sale and conveyancing. They gave standard weights to neighboring nations which remained in use long after the break-up of the Hittite empire.

Warm Weather in Australia.

The most remarkable feature of the Australian climate is the hot wind. The flat, sandy interior of the continent resembles the deserts of North Africa and Arabia, and the winds, therefore, are very similar. Immense quantities of sand are drifted about by the wind and carried beyond the coast a considerable distance out to sea. On Jan. 21, 1845, Capt. Sturt's thermometer rose to 171° in the shade; the mean temperature for December was 101°, for January 104°, and for February 101°. So parched was the ground that there were great cracks in it from 8 to 10 feet deep. At Cooper's Creek on Nov. 11, 1845, he experienced one of these hot-air currents, and thus describes it; "The wind, which had been blowing all morning from north-east, increased to a gale, and I shall never forget its withering effects. I sought shelter behind a large gum tree, but the blasts of heat were so terrific that I wondered the very grass did not take fire; everything, both animate and inanimate, gave way before it; the horses stood with their backs to the wind and their noses to the ground, the birds were mute, and the leaves of the trees fell like a shower round us. At noon I took out my thermometer, graduated to 127°, and put it in the fork of a tree, and an hour afterwards, when I went to examine it, the tube was full of mercury and the bulb had burst; about sunset the wind shifted to west, and a thundercloud passed over us, but only a few drops of rain fell." The bursting of the instrument shows that the temperature was much higher than 127°, the glass being unable to assist the expansion of the mercury. Vegetation suffers greatly from the parching character of this wind. Plants droop, leaves shrivel as if frost-bitten, and wheat crops have been destroyed. Its intense dryness is shown by the relative humidity falling to zero, and evaporation amounting to an inch of water a day. High up in the mountains to the east and south-east, in the midst of a frosty morning, occasional hot blasts are felt from the interior, and they cause a peculiar irritation of the nostrils and throat. Although disagreeable as heated air and fatal to vegetation, this dry wind, like that of India, is healthy. The dry climate is practically free from miasmatic diseases.

Digging Potatoes as The Raced.

An interesting race was witnessed at South Auburn, N.Y., the other day. The race was between two men to see who could dig a row each of potatoes the quickest. There was money up on the result of the race. The contestants were ex-Mayor Haskell of Auburn and J. D. Johnson of Portland. Neither of the men had any knowledge of the art. Each was equipped with a common hoe. Both men went in to win, and it is said that the potatoes and dirt flew surprisingly. It reminded a man standing near of a dog digging for a woodchuck.

At the close the ex-Mayor came out twenty-seven hills ahead of his competitor. It was no fault of his, though, but due to luck. Directly in the path of his row about midway of the stint was a monster stump. Here he went ahead the length of twenty potato hills. A bit further on he came to a place where seven hills had been removed, and the ex-Mayor went to the front and held it to the finish. It was an exciting race.

rubber, in order that the regular monotonous footfalls of the regulation police boot may not warn the murderer of approaching danger.

The Trick of the Ravens.

In the narrative of the Arctic voyage of Captain McClure is the following story of the two ravens which became domiciliated on board the "Investigator." The raven, it appears, is the only bird that willingly braves a Polar winter; and in the depth of the season he is seen to flit through the cold and sunless atmosphere like an evil spirit, his sullen croak alone breaking the silence of the death-like scene. No one of the crew attempted to shoot the ravens, and they consequently became very bold, as will be seen by the narrative. Two ravens established themselves as friends of the family in Mercer Bay, living mainly by what little scraps the men might have thrown away after meal-times. The ship's dog, however, looked upon these as his special perquisites, and exhibited considerable energy in maintaining his rights against the ravens, who nevertheless outwitted him in a way which amused every one. Observing that he appeared quite willing to make a mouthful of their own sable persons, they used to throw themselves intentionally in his way just as the mess tins were being cleaned out on the dirt-heap outside the ship. The dog would immediately run at them, and they would fly just a few yards; the dog then made another run, and again they would appear to escape him but by an inch, and so on, until they had tempted and provoked him to the shore, a considerable distance off. Then the ravens would make a direct flight for the ship, and had generally done good execution before the mortified-looking dog detected the imposition that had been practised upon him and rushed back again.

An Interesting Subject.

The results of an investigation on a subject of striking interest are submitted by the redoubtable "Bab" in the New York Sunday Star, when she writes:—

A man asked me the other day how women find husbands. It was such a puzzling question to me that I constituted myself a committee of one and went around among a lot of married women to see how their husbands proposed to them. There wasn't one who had ever had an absolute romantic avowal of love! There wasn't one whose husband had gotten down on his knees, caught the loved one's hand and besought of her, unless she wished to see him stark and cold with a broken heart, that she would wed him! There wasn't one who had ever known the rapture of being held, with a pistol pointed at her head, while the brave lover pronounced that unless she accepted him, he would kill her and then himself! There wasn't one who had been gained even at the dagger's point, and not a single wife had been drugged and wedded in a semi-conscious state! Dorothy, I confess to a certain amount of disappointment. The nearest I could get as to how the question of marriage had been reached was always that they drifted into it. This is deliciously vague, but it seems to mean that they knew the man, that he had the privilege of holding their hands and criticising their frocks for some time, and that then, when there was no special excitement in Wall street, a Presidential election wasn't going on, nor anything else that was distracting, they suggested that it was about time for them to get married.

"Dearest Stanley, what has happened; Speak to me." "Aw, nevah mind! stwive no moah! Spent months and months inventing the scarf. First time I go out I meet a fellow from the Bowwowry with one just like it. No use. I stwive no moah."

of sale and conveyancing. They gave standard weights to neighboring nations which remained in use long after the break-up of the Hittite empire.

Well advanced in the arts of peace, they were also formidable as warriors. Their troops, both foot and horse, are represented in the Egyptian hieroglyphics as marching in battle array with well-drilled precision. But the chariots were their pride, each of which carried three warriors and were very formidable.

The Hittites were a great people for thousands of years, built great cities, excelled in the arts, fought great wars, and then disappeared, leaving almost no trace. Little by little some knowledge of them is gained from inscriptions and hieroglyphics, but it is hard to comprehend that when their overthrow occurred at such a comparatively modern time they should have been so nearly forgotten.

Parrot Chorus.

The traditional "fish story" has many varieties, to which it seems only fair to add the following, even though the fish in this case was a parrot. Doubtless its narrator, an American artist, designed it to be "taken for what it is worth."

He was very fond of knocking about in out-of-the-way quarters of the world, and once left ship with a party of comrades, in order to explore a Central American wilderness. During the cruise of several months, the entire ship's company had devoted their leisure hours to singing to a parrot. The sailors had also lost no opportunity of teaching the bird all the nautical phrases they knew.

When the artist and his comrades had bidden the bird and the sailors good-by, they plunged into the heart of the tropical forest, and after great exertion in accomplishing twenty-eight miles, they reached their camping-place for the night. Just as the sun was going down, they were startled to hear, in the primeval silence, a familiar voice from the top of a tall palm:

"Avast there! Yo, heave, ho!"

It was the ship's parrot. Before they could quite believe in its presence, the faithful bird fluttered down to a dead stump near by, and, with a shrill cry, summoned the little green paroquets of the country. About ten thousand of them circled round the great gray African oracle on the stump, and finally took their places, in good order, on the ground. The explorers looked on in dumb amazement.

When the feathered assemblage became quiet, the ship's parrot broke into the familiar words of "Nancy Lee;" and, to the inextinguishable amusement of the travellers, the surprise of the tropical world, and the delight of the feathered conductor, those ten thousand paroquets, with one mighty burst of song, executed "Nancy Lee."

The late terrible accident at Ottawa with the balloon ought to lead to some stringent regulations being made in reference to that somewhat dangerous amusement. Indeed the fact of its being dangerous is one chief part of its attraction and therefore the more need why the whole thing should be placed under the most careful restrictions. A man has no right to put his own life, however worthless it be, into jeopardy in order to give his fellows sport, or to thrill their nervous system with a strong sensation. Of course it may be urged that if the owner of the life is paid for the risk, he can do as he pleases. Not exactly. Things are not come to that pass in Canada yet, though no one can say apparently how soon they may. It is the danger which gives the chief piquancy to the whole thing, and it is on that account also that it should either be put down or very carefully regulated.

A Trip Through Manitoba.

By our own correspondent.

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE, October 3rd, 1888.

My last letter was dated from Portage La Prairie, and now, after spending a week in the western and northern country, I am again writing from the Portage. This town is not what I expected to find it. The people, like the inhabitants of a good many other places, thought that they were going to have a second Chicago, and the town was laid out on that expectation. There are about 2,500 people here, and they are scattered along Saskatchewan avenue for a distance of considerably over a mile. The streets are but poor affairs, but the stores compare favorably with those of other western towns. The municipality of Portage La Prairie is virtually bankrupt, as it has had to repudiate a portion of its debt and compromise with the rest of its creditors. This makes taxes high. The Portage has the advantage of having a magnificent country to the north and west, and will undoubtedly grow to be a large town if not a respectable sized city. A new hotel has just been opened, the Grand Pacific, at which good accommodation can be obtained at reasonable rates; everything clean and nice and good meals. A week ago while here, rain was falling in torrents, so I postponed my drive into the country and went to Brandon by the C. P. R. The country is somewhat broken along the line of the railway between these points, but at Burnside, and especially at Carberry station, I saw some magnificent fields of wheat. At Carberry station a man by the name of Lyons has a field of wheat of 400 acres. I am told that it will average thirty bushels to the acre, and believe that is about right. It is a magnificent sample, and the sight of 400 acres of choice wheat is enough to make the heart of an Ontario farmer bound with delight.

At Brandon I was met by Rev J. P. Wilson and driven to the parsonage in his phaeton, where I had a royal welcome. Found Mr Wilson and his family all well and enjoying life. I remained with them five days, and during that time was driven around the city and country and given ample opportunity to see the sights. Mr Wilson drove me out of Brandon about two miles to see Frank Reid's farm. It consists of 640 acres of good land with first-rate frame buildings on it, and cost Mr Reid $10,000 about two years ago. Last year he cropped between 300 and 400 acres, and this year about the same. Last year he had 14,000 bushels of wheat, besides some barley and oats. He keeps a large herd of cattle and sells milk in Brandon. This year Mr. Reid has about 11,000 bushels of wheat for which he is offered $1 a bushel, and also has a little over 2,500 bushels of barley and oats. He only paid $500 down when he bought his farm, and in the two years he will have his farm, implements and stock all paid for and money in the bank. A pretty good record for farming in Manitoba! His crop town, procured a team of horses and an open carriage and drove his brother, Mr Laidman, of Hamilton, Ont., and myself out through the Portage Plains. We drove along the line of the Manitoba and North-western Railway as near as possible and saw sights that I never expected to see. In the first place the roads are perfect, and there is no more jolting than there would be in driving over a level floor. In the next place the farms are all under cultivation, properly fenced and with first-class buildings on them,—and then, to cap all, we drove through miles and miles of wheat. The large sheeks stood on the ground as thickly as I ever saw sheaves in Ontario. On one man's farm the grain was stacked up, and he had twenty-six large stacks. Threshing was going on at Mr Sisson's farm, about four miles northwest of Portage La Prairie, and we drove in to see the machine at work. The thresher was a monstrous affair, driven by a steam engine, the straw being used for fuel. Four teams were drawing to the machine and three more teams taking the grain away. A load of wheat stood at each side of the machine and the men were pitching for all they were worth down to the feeders. The grain was pouring from the machine as thick as a man's leg, and such grain I never saw before. Mr Sisson has a farm of 400 acres, and has a little over half of it to wheat this year. He told me his crop was turning out a little over thirty bushels to the acre and weighed sixty-five pounds to the bushel. What would an Ontario farmer think if he had such a crop as that? Passing on we drove a couple of miles past the station of Macdonald and saw thousands and thousands of acres of just such wheat as I have described. Just near the station we visited the farm of McLean and McRobbie. The grain buyer was there at that time and Mr McRobbie sold him 8,000 bushels of wheat for $8,000. This is but a portion of their crop. They are farming 900 acres and Mr McRobbie told me that they would clear over $12,000 this year. They have just sold 400 acres about a mile from the station for $10,000, and are buying an unbroken half section just near their other farm for which they pay $20 an acre. The frost has been very slight in this section and I am of the opinion that as the country is settled, there will be little or no trouble with frost. Even with the frost the crops are vastly in excess of anything I ever saw in Ontario. The soil is said to be the best in the world, and is certainly the best that I ever ran across. It works up better than a dry ash heap. During our drive we saw many curious sights. We met a papoose heading for Portage and driving four dogs, each with a bag of grain roped on its back. Another dog helped her look after the four. The grain is gleaned where the threshers have been at work and the squaws and papooses make many a dollar in this way. At one farm at which we stopped, an Indian was at work as a farm hand. His "teppee" or wigwam, was erected in the yard and the farmer's wife asked us to examine it. The squaw was in it and was very indignant at the white folks' intrusion. She turned her back to us, drew her blanket over her head and refused to talk, even to the woman. The teppee is a curious affair. It consists of a lot of poles set up in the shape of a cone a covering of skin stretched around them. A fire was burning in the centre of the teppee and the remains of the dinner were scattered around. It was not such a place as I would like to live in, but the Indians seem perfectly contented. I saw many Indians at work in the fields. They get a dollar and a half per day and make fairly good workmen. We reached home about dusk, having driven about thirty miles through what I believe to be the finest farming country in the world.

only paid $500 down when he bought his farm, and in the two years he will have his farm, implements and stock all paid for and money in the bank. A pretty good record for farming in Manitoba! His crop was slightly frosted, which knocked off at least five bushels to the acre. I visited another farm about two miles south of Brandon, and found that a fine crop of about twenty bushels to the acre had been grown on fifty-six acres. This wheat had also been slightly frosted. The worst section near Brandon, if not the worst in the whole of Manitoba, is about twelve miles northwest of the city in the electoral district of north Brandon. A strip about three miles in width, extends right through the township and here the frost has not left a kernel. The farmers are completely destitute. On Saturday last they were visited by Arthur Sifton, M. P. P., with a view of finding out the facts and Mr Sifton told me the above at the tea table that evening just after his return. It is expected that the government will supply seed wheat to these farmers next spring. In driving through the country we took guns with us and had some rare sport. On one occasion we came across a flock of teal just at a ford in the Assinaboine river, and blazed away at them. With one shot each we knocked over five, and Dr. Carman, who helped eat them on Saturday evening, pronounced them "fine birds." We also shot a couple of very large plover, so we had quite a game dinner. The soil in the immediate vicinity of Brandon is rather light and sandy. Some claim that it is better than the richer land, as it ripens the grain earlier, but this year the frost seems to have struck full as heavily there as at the [illegible] where the soil is the richest in the [illegible]

Upwards of seventy-five new buildings have gone up this year, and they are of that substantial character that forces you to the conclusion that the success of Brandon is a settled fact. The town now has a population of nearly 7,000, and is growing rapidly. Rent costs from $15 to $30 a month. Living is high. Coal costs $12 a ton, and wood $5 and $6 a cord. Groceries and dry goods are slightly in advance of Ontario prices, while apples sell for 5c. a pound. Fruit is very scarce and very dear. Beef sells at a York shilling, poultry at from 15 to 20c. a pound. Everything in that line sells at so much per pound.

On Saturday afternoon Dr. Carman arrived, and preached two very able sermons on the Sabbath. The church of which Mr. Wilson is pastor is in a highly prosperous condition, and the people are delighted with their pastor; in fact he is one of the most popular men in Brandon, judging from what the people told me. The church will seat about 600, and is well filled morning and evening. The loose collections—that is, the collections outside the envelopes—run from $15 to $20 per Sunday, and on Sunday last were a little over $25. Last fall Mr. Wilson asked for a special offering, and over $700 was put on the plates. These western people are "busters" to give.

On Monday afternoon I left Brandon on my return trip and arrived at the Portage shortly after three o'clock. Ever since Wednesday last the weather has been simply charming. The bright clear days are apt to make one think that September and not October, has just commenced. I never experienced finer fall weather in my life.

Yesterday Mr. Isaac Laidman, of this dollar and a half per day and make fairly good workmen. We reached home about dusk, having driven about thirty miles through what I believe to be the finest farming country in the world.

Correct Account of the Moscow Burglary.

On Tuesday night the store of Vanluven Bros, general merchants, of Moscow, was entered by burglars with the intention of taking what they wished, in which they failed.

Egerton, one of the brothers, retired in a bedroom in the upper part of the store about 9.30 o'clock and was awakened about 12 o'clock by a noise. He listened a minute and could plainly hear men talking at his room door. He could not hear what they were saying but thought they were conversing over the best method of entering his room, the door being located to put him in a position that he would make no noise to disturb them in their plunder.

This thought Egerton, and he did not wait to consider further knowing that he was without fire-arms for the first night in a long time, but sprang to his feet and opening a window which lets down from the top a short distance, he shouted Murder, Murder. This frightened the robbers and they ran down stairs and into the road and on seeing no stir from the neighbors they fired two shots at Eg. At this moment Everton, who was sleeping at the house, which is about 20 rods distant, heard his brother's wild cries for help and in response shouted, from his bedroom window, that he was coming with a rifle but before Everton, after considerable could get part of his clothes on and get his revolver they had fired two more shots at Eg and then fled in an unseen direction. Everton ran to the store and fired a shot at random not being able to see or hear the robbers. Some of the neighbors were then routed and after deciding that there was but little chance of a capture in pursuing them, on account of there being four leading roads from the store branching into other roads only short distances from here and it was not known which road they went. An examination of the premises was made which showed that they had entered the store at the front door by bursting the lock and it is supposed they walked straight to the safe in the office which is directly under where Egerton was then asleep with the intention of opening it as soon as they fixed Egerton so he would not give an alarm, as they left a couple of chisels on the safe that they took from Mr Palmer's carriage shop to assist in this purpose. They were just about as well off that they were saved of this trouble as there was only a small amount of cash in the safe, the brothers having decided from the many safe robberies of late that a safe is an unsafe place to keep money, had what cash they had on hand in a more safe place.

It seems to be the general opinion that the robbers came quite a long distance. The fact that the brothers are treasurers for the patrons of the Moscow cheese factory and only on Tuesday paid out quite an amount of cheese money and had they been near here they would likely have known that the cheese money was to be divided and would therefore have a good reason to expect a better haul on Monday evening.

One of the balls that they fired at Eg was buried deep in the wood near where his head was.—Com.

The best concert held here for some time took place the night of the Camden Show. There was a good attendance, the proceeds being $82.

A good program was supplied by Misses Briggs, Blair and Messrs Maylee, Ferguson and Craig of the Presbyterian Choir, Napanee, and Messrs. Crumley, Cooper, Galloway and Smythe of Kingston. Recitations were given by Miss Vandewater, and Messrs. Ferguson and Crumley. Mr W. C. Scott acted as chairman.

Westplain.

Mr. James McKitrick intends employing W. D. Waddell to lay out the lawn in front of his house. Mr. W. is an adept at this work.

Our village blacksmith, Mr. J. McCumber, and his cousin, (two young nimrods), went hunting the deer or some other game; with what luck has not been told.

Master W. H. A. Waddell went to Napanee this morning with two of his friends, to leave that town for Roscommon, for a winter campaign in the wild woods of Michigan.

Miss Minnie D. Waddell is enjoying herself at Rochester. She says the Genesee Falls are wonderful and grand. She and Miss Breamer had a look at the whirpool where her father used to swim when he lived in Rochester, 35 years ago.

Pleasant Valley.

There has been considerable sickness on this street this season.

Mr Elias Smith is very ill with the fever, and Miss G. Hominy is very poorly.

Mrs David Ruttan is going to remove from the model farm, and Mrs Frank Vandebogart removes about 1st November.

We are pleased to be able to state that Mr and Mrs Smith have recovered from their sickness so far as to be able to be out and around. Their son Frank is also on the mend.

MRS. T. M. CATON.

Thorpe, Ont., Oct 15th, 1888.

Selby.

The services in connection with the Methodist Church held on the 14th and 15th were a complete success. On Sabbath Dr. Williams delivered eloquent and instructive sermons to large congregations; in the evening the church was literally packed.

On Monday evening tea was served in the lecture room and over three hundred assembled to enjoy this festival. The ladies spared no pains to make this part of the entertainment a success and as a result the feast was everything that could be desired. The programme was more than usually interesting, although several speakers who were invited were unable to attend. W. F. Hall, Esq., of Napanee, not being present, Rev. W. H. Cook presided. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Williams and Rev. T. Cleworth. The music was furnished by Miss Cook, Miss Jaynes, Miss Hudgins, Mr Rose, Mr Jaynes, Mr Paul, and the choir, and was excellent. The church is said by all to be a great improvement on the old one and the building committee are to be congratulated on the way they have managed affairs.

Malarial fever is quite prevalent in the village, Mr Wartman's family have been very much afflicted with it, but we are glad to hear are improving.

Yarker.

M. Dunn has been appointed station master here.

Bible class meetings have been resumed for every Monday night.

Mrs. Adam Wiseman, of Odessa, is at her daughter's Mrs. S. Winter.

A. Vanluvan, Wm. Gorden and A. Connolly left for Tweed, to settle there.

Peter is not at all jealous of the Mills who shot the bear, as he succeeded recently in downing a fine deer.

Wm. Silver, of Carthage, N.Y., is at his brother's here. He had the misfortune to lose his leg, but is improving fast.

Car loads of coal from the Rathbun Co. are moving over the N. T. & Q. for the various villages; coal in Yarker $6 per ton.

The scholars of Yarker public school sent a handsome floral wreath to be placed upon the coffin of Miss Mary Smith, their late school teacher.

Fenwick Connolly is enclosing his property with handsome fences. A fine monument has been erected over the remains of the late J. C. Connolly.

The new roller mill is turning out a good grade of flour, and is crowded with orders. G. McDonald is paying the highest price for wheat, so farmers have a good market at home.

Quarry men are at work here getting out stone for the completion of bridges and culverts on the N. T. & Q. railroad. This road will be completed to Tweed next year.

Close's Mills.

On Tuesday evening, 17th inst., about 6 p. m., lightning played havoc on a barn occupied by Geo. Vanalstine, near Close's Mills, in North Fredericksburgh. It tore off nearly all the clapboards on the east end of the large barn; ripped into kindling the second rafter and another about 20ft from the end and slivered up a large beam. The pieces were scattered a long distance east of the barn. Two sons, who were in the stable attending their teams, were stunned and unable to move for a few minutes but recovered. One of the horses dropped as if shot but soon recovered. Two of the family who were milking close by, saw fire roll along the roof and smoke issuing which had filled the building. Fire did not catch as the mow was empty. Damage done to the building about $60.

ATTAR OF ROSES.

An Account of Its Manufacture—A Precious Essential Oil.

Until the sixteenth century we have no authentic mention of attar. The story of its origin is told in the history of the Mogul empire. The sultana Nourmahal, the light of the harem, during a feast which she gave to the grand mogul Jehanguir, caused a canal to be filled with rose water, where they bathed in its perfumed water and floated about over its surface. After some days a curious substance was observed on the surface. Upon examination it proved to be the essence of the roses, which the heat of the sun had caused to gather on the top of the rose water, and the delicious fragrance induced them to turn this accidental discovery to account. Since that day roses have been cultivated in Persia, in India and in Turkey for the manufacture of the essence.

While in different parts of the east great quantities of roses are grown for their essential oil, the province of Roumelia is perhaps the most important center for the industry. On the lofty plain, bounded on the north by the Balkan mountains, are planted the great rose gardens, where the finest attar in the world is made. Kasanlik, the center of the district, means in the Turkish tongue place of boilers. The roses are planted by the farmers of this district on sloping ground facing the sun, and where the soil is sandy. Laying down a rose garden may be done in the spring or fall, the ground being cleared of weeds. Young rose shoots are torn from the old plants, so as to carry with them a part of the roots. These are laid almost horizontally in trenches five feet apart. In six months or so the shoots appear, and are earthed up, and in almost a year the plants stand like young hedges, about a foot high. It is not till the end of the third year that the blossoming is of any importance. At the end of the fifth the plants are in full bearing, and they continue blooming for fifteen years longer. It does not do to enrich the soil too heavily, as it injures the quality of the essential oil quite as much as it improves the quantity. Hoar frost, fog and dampness are very injurious; in 1870 all the roses in this district were killed.

In May, when the gardens are a sheet of bloom, the harvest begins. The roses are of several kinds, but all single or nearly so—pale pink or white, and very much like our wild roses. Early in the morning the pickers begin, while the dew is on the flowers. The petals are taken from the stalks, and at once put into great copper alembics, capable of holding about 240 pounds of water. Into each of these alembics, with their downward pointing nozzles, are put 180 pounds of water and twenty-five pounds of rose leaves. This is then distilled till the turbid rose water amounts to twenty-five pounds. The boilers are emptied, cleansed, and the process is re-vicinity frequently.

Miss Hannah Peters is dangerously ill at her home with typhoid fever.

Miss Jennie Wager, of Selby, is spending a few weeks with friends here.

We understand that Mr A. Walker is repairing his residence. That's right.

The Misses O'Dea have removed their shop to Mr. Kennedy's house opposite the hotel.

Two weddings last week, and rumor says there is soon to be another. The bells are already ringing.

The hum of industry is heard in the village, and potato digging and corn husking is the general occupation among the farmers.

Napanee Mills.

Miss A. Jenkins, of Napanee, spent Saturday, Sunday and Monday with her sister, Mrs R. Scott.

A couple of weeks ago Mr Armstrong shipped a car load of eggs, and on Tuesday another carload.

Mrs S. Miller has leased the farm recently vacated by Reuben Herrington, to Mr Sexsmith, of Deseronto.

The population of this place is on the increase. During last week a number of families moved here from Newburgh and other places. Business is lively.

Some of those who were first prostrated with the fever, we are pleased to see able to be out doors again. More fresh cases are reported, and in one instance the infection is said to have been carried on the wings of cupid.

While Mr S. Scouten was assisting in an apple orchard, the other day, the step ladder on which he stood spread, allowing him to come down rather unceremoniously, with a basket of fruit in his arms. Nothing worse happened than a slight shaking up, we are glad to say.

Some wag, with chalk, has christened the spot where the new sidewalk ends abruptly at the corner of the old boarding house, the "lubbers, (not lovers) leep." It may prove a convenient means of exit to those who meet with disappointment in love, and a tragic circumstance or two of the kind would lend to the precipice a tender melancholy interest.

The home-made bread of this place has been pronounced to be excellent. The pie we know is good, and suppose that some susceptable young man will next discover that the cake is exceptional; also young ladies should take great pains in perfecting themselves in the art of cookery; for no matter what personal charms they may possess, these will not always supply the place of such substantial accomplishments. The average man is the fastidious feeder and generally, very soon after the honeymoon, exhibits much more stomach than heart, to the consternation of the tender young wife.

We regret that the good name of the place, on Sunday evening, was compromised by the culpable conduct of four or five of our young men, of whom we certainly expected better things. It seems that a gentleman from Napanee, attending the prayer-meeting, was set upon and rotten egged and Mr. Thos. Budd, the station master, who was in his company at the time, was bespattered with the filthy stuff. We have failed to learn that there existed any justifiable provocation for such ungentlemanly conduct, though it has been hinted that the Napanee young gentleman enjoys the favor of certain of our fairest and most respectable maidens, and that the egg throwing was the result of jealousy. Hitherto we have considered our people above such actions, and trust that the like will never happen again. Young men will find out that such work will not raise them in the good opinion of sensible ladies, or any

Odessa.

Oct 16.—The concert in aid of the church of England building fund, Friday evening, was very successful. A good programme; a bumper house and about $40 in the treasury,

Since our last writing three deaths have occurred, and in the trio the fact is brought stubbornly to bear that the old must die, the young may.

Uncle Jonn P. Davy had over-reached the Psalmist's margin, being 84 years, 10 mos and a few days, when the dissolution came. He passed his lengthened visit on the farm of his choice in Quobin, on the banks of a pretty river, was an inoffensive man and thereby held the esteem of his large acquaintance. He was a staunch reformer in his political views, having followed the destinies of that particular one of the two great parties from its earliest inception, and in his time has seen many noble enactments traced on the statutes through their efforts, to the tendency of a fairer Dominion. Whilst thus engaged he made sure of his own more important election with the blessed. The funeral on Wednesday was largely attended. Rev Mr Young preached an able sermon after which the remains of one of our oldest and much respected friends were conveyed to Wilton cemetery.

The latter part of our quotation may die, is patent in the death the same day, of the infant son of Joseph and Mrs McConnell, at about two years of age.

The third bereavement in our locality for the week was the very sudden death of Mrs John McDonald, in her 62nd year, from heart disease. The lady was devoted to her family and church, and among the worshippers attending mass on the 20th of September last, who were so kindly photographed in Father McWilliams' justly celebrated views, stands prominently Mrs McDonald. The remains were deposited in the Catholic vault at Kingston.

Whilst some are called on to mourn, others rejoice. Such is the way of the world. Our hunters have hied themselves hither to the back wood, expecting a most enjoyable outing and plenty of game. May both of the latter be in abundance and Stanley, Jud and others return to us brown as a muffin and hearty as a robust buck.

There appears to be a great deal of courting, making ready for Judge Wilkison's coming. John A.,—the clerk—is issuing licenses left handed. Some people, it seems, prefer a court receipt to any other.

We were pleased to see Mr Allan Chadwick, sr., up street again to day, the first in about two months.

Mrs (Dr) Mabee has been lately very ill, but is now improving,

Mr and Mrs Fitzsimmons, of Brockville, are spending a pleasant time with their daughter,. Mrs (Rev) Quartermaine. Mr Fitzsimmons is postmaster at Brockville.

William and Mrs Lee, of Alexandria Bay, N. Y., are visiting friends here.

Mr George Ferguson and Mr Adam Wiseman have set out a number of shade trees across their property, beautifying the places muchly.

Important to Working Men.

Artizans, mechanics and laboring men are liable to sudden accidents and injuries, as well as painful cords, stiff joints and lameness. To all thus troubled we would reccomend Hagyard's Yellow Oil, the handy and reliable pain cure for outward or internal use.

is then distilled till the turbid rose water amounts to twenty-five pounds. The boilers are emptied, cleansed, and the process is repeated. The turbid fluid is again distilled, and then allowed to remain at rest. On the surface of this double distilled rose water the precious essential oil rises like a greenish or yellowish scum. This is skimmed off by means of a conical spoon, with a small hole in the bottom to allow the water to run away. The appliances are all very rude, and there must necessarily be much waste in a material so precious. According to estimates made at Kasanlik it takes about 4,000 pounds of roses to make one pound of oil. And from 4,000 to 6,000 pounds of roses are the largest crops raised upon an (English) acre of land. The price for the pure attar is about $4 per ounce.—Sophie B. Herrick in The Cosmopolitan.

When the Mountains Were Made.

The chief beauty of Mount Desert Island is in its mountains. From a little distance they seem to rise grandly out of the very blue of the sea. The highest, Mount Green, reaches an elevation of nearly 2,000 feet. As you approach the sunshine flooding their rounded peaks gives them a bronzed, metallic appearance. But from a league away their real beauty and grandeur break lovingly upon the vision. Verdure clad in places, again showing massive bulwarks of rock, and from each height sloping in graceful undulations to the sea, a rare and winsome charm, as well as a broad and stalwart majesty, possesses them. Wherever one may be within sight of the splendid masses it is impossible to cease their contemplation. Thus musing on them in the spirit of geologic conjecture and revelry, I half unconsciously asked my skipper if he had any idea of their age.

"A leetle up'ard 'n a hundred year," he answered promptly. I looked at him with amazement, and it nettled him.

"A leetle up'ard 'n a hundred year!" he repeated stolidly, setting his teeth hard upon his tobacco and eyeing me askance, as if with initiatory feelings of resentment at my unaccountable ignorance. "Them ar thirteen mountings ain't thar fur nuthin'. Them ar thirteen self same mountings riz plum' up outen the bay the very day they d'clar'd 'pendence to these Yoonterd States! Them as seed it lived right hereabout."

"But, captain," I pleaded, aghast at this startling revelation, "you know De Monts and Champlain discovered the island just 284 years ago; named it 'L'Isle des Monts Deserts,' from the dreary appearance of the tops of those very mountains; and Briard and Masse, the French Jesuits, established a mission over there on the western shore of Some's Sound?"

In tones of awful scorn my skipper merely answered: "Did, did they? Wall, I s'pose sech scallops comes from schoolin'. I say no man livin' was in these parts afore my forefathers; an' them that's dead and doubted"—this with contemptuous grief—"seed with their own eyes them thirteen mountings hist up their heads. Howsumdever, there's no argerin with sneerers!"—Edgar L. Wakeman's Letter.

His Preference.

"Of all seasons of the year, Dr. Diagnosis," she said to a young physician who was helping her look at the moon, "which do you most prefer?"

"I think I prefer the watermelon season," he replied in a low business tone of voice.—The Epoch.

NEW : TEAS

We beg to advise our numerous customers and the public generally that we are now in receipt of our New Tea, this year's crop, comprising Japan, Souchong, Oolong, Congou and finest Assam Pekoe which we have resolved to sell at the smallest living profit in order to enlarge our tea trade which has grown immensely of late, and which in future we intend to make a specialty in our business

To convince those who have heretofore bought tea of peddlers of the extreme folly of paying from 10 to 20 cents more per lb for tea than a better article can be bought for from us, we ask but one trial of our new teas. In these tight times for money a saving of only ten cents per lb on tea means quite a saving in the yearly expenses of a family.

Remember that for the trifling sum of 25 cents per lb we are now selling an extremely fine drawing Japan Tea far surpassing anything in that line heretofore sold at that price. Try it, it will cause you to come for more.

HEALTH.

Diagnosis by Position.

There is much in the position assumed by the sick which, when carefully observed, will help to determine the nature of the malady.

A writer on the subject says:

The position on the back, which fat people adopt for convenience, is characteristic of inflammation of the bowels, since those who suffer from this affection are not able to endure the least friction of the abdomen, and it is observed also in diseases of acute and grave character, such as tetanus, articular rheumatism, etc. This is assumed passively when the patient, having lost his strength, occupies the lowest part of the couch, the head falls from the pillow of its own weight, the arm, as indeed the whole organism, obeys the action of gravity, as occurs in infectious diseases and intense inflammatory processes. This position is usually accompanied by disordered movements of the hands, as if the patient would reach up to something suspended before the face. It always indicates a grave condition.

Lying over on the stomach is observed in abdominal diseases accompanied by strong nervous pains, gastralgias, flatulent, nervous and nephritic colics, etc., and sometimes in case of anterior pulmonary cavities. In the former affections the patients find relief by compressing the affected region; and in the latter they hinder by this position the escape of the secretions from the cavities through the corresponding bronchial tubes, consequently calming the cough.

Children who suffer from hydrocephalus have a tendency to place the head lower than the body, and therefore when held in the arms they allow the head to fall.

Lying upon the side, and especially the right, is the most physiological position that the sick can adopt, and it always indicates a satisfactory degree of muscular strength.

In pneumonia children generally rest on the left side, but not so adults, who, if they do not adopt the supine position, lie ordinarily on the sound side. This double position in the same disease may be explained by the fact that in children pneumonias are more diffused and affect nearly the whole of a lung, and therefore they instinctively avoid compression of the sound lung in order to allow it to perform its function with greater freedom; in adults, on the contrary, the disease is ordinarily limited, and there is no inconvenience in adopting a lateral position on the sound side; at the same time they avoid in this way increasing the contagion of the affected part, and thereby diminish the pain and cough.

In painful dry pleurisies the patient keeps the affected part still as much as possible, and at first rests on the sound side, to diminish the congestion of the affected side, by the elevation of which the cough and pain are mitigated; but when fluid beginsto accumulate in the chest cavity, later in this disease, the patient will constantly adopt a position on the diseased side so as to avoid compressing the opposite lung, and to allow it to perform its function with entire freedom.

A continual change of position indicates intense excitation of the nervous system, the head of the patient turns continuously from right to left, the trunk is not quiet, and the whole individual is attacked with a general irritability, so that he makes continuons efforts to leave the bed. This phenomenon is usually observed at the acme of acute infections fevers and brain inflammations. The upright position, characterized by a general distress, the forward inclination of the trunk, the fixation and elevation of the arms, as if to give the thorax a point of support and to bring into exercise the state of the inner surface, which may be accompanied with some pain. When the eye tires easily, rest is not the proper remedy, but the use of glasses of sufficient power to aid in accommodating the eye to vision.

The Little Girl of Ten.

I met her at the depot in the ticket-buyers' row;
She was travelling unattended to the town where I must go,
And I saw her buy a ticket for an adult with surprise,
When a "half' card would have answered for a maiden of her size.

I heard the agent ask her if she wanted one "full rate."
And she said, "I want a ticket" (very curtly did she say it);
So I did not at the moment interfere in her affairs,
Though I wondered what she meant by such very aged airs."

Then at length I said most kindly to the girl so slightly grown,
"Do you travel very often on the railway all alone?"
"Not so very often," said she; "but I had a wish today
To leave the noisy city and go very far away."

Then I told her of her error, which had prompted to speak
(Here a blush of modest crimson ran its course upon her cheek),
And to do her simple justice I would go with her and make
The agent fix the matter as it should be, for her sake.

To my proffer she assented, and not vainly was it tried,
For she got the cheaper ticket, with a dollar at its side,
And she thanked me. Then I asked her to go with me to a seat,
Which she did not hesitate to do, and went on nimple feet.

But I fancied as we rode along, and passed from place to place,
That she had a world of knowledge for so very young a face;
That she seemed a trifle older than her modest height would show;
Then, with manners quite avuncular, I thought it best to know.
Our talk and trip were ending, but I soon adventured then,
"My little girl, you are not, are you, very far from ten?"
But she said, with farther blushing—with a twinkle not unseen—
"I am doubtless very childlike, but my age is just sixteen.

Then I looked and saw my blunder, but the vexing ways of Fate
Left my heart to solve a problem and to wildly palpitate:
For I had put my arm around her, and was toying with her hair,
And she seemed to think it kindness—or she didn't seem to care

In a moment, if the answer had not come so pat as this,
I should have proffered her directions on arrival with a kiss.
But my wisdom always happens much too early or too late.
For the girl was very pretty and—confound the course of Fa's!

So I jumped up with my satchel (barely looking as I went)
From a task begun in pity, ending sharp in discontent.
But she bowed and smiled most sweetly, while I thought how very mean
That I couldn't stoop to kiss her just because she said "sixteen!"

Fashion Notes.

The majority of dress skirts are made either with flat pleats down the front and sides that reach from belt to hem, or with long Greek overdresses that are so lightly draped as to cover nearly the whole of the underskirt front and back.

Too late to be of much use this year, but in time to be adopted extensively next summer, says The New York Sun, the girls have learned the beauty of the flannel shirt idea and many of them have put it into operation. A flannel shirt exactly like those made for the men, boy's size, worn inside of a dress body and belted in at the waist, is very charming and comfortable beyond imagining.

A CANADIAN SNAKE CHARMER.

A St John, New Brunswick, Man Who Makes Pets of Reptiles.

The St. John, N. B., Progress says there is nothing about the personal appearance of William McIntosh to indicate that he has more controlling force than any ordinary person. He is a young man, rather light complexioned, quiet of voice and speaks in a deliberate manner that shows his careful good sense.

Mr. McIntosh is a successful snake charmer.

At his father's flower store on Charlotte street he has at present a common black snake, about two feet long, which he treats much the same as anybody else would treat a piece of rope that long, only more affectionately, perhaps. The snake is poisonous and shows his mettle with everybody but Mr. McIntosh, who can coil him round his neck, rub the snake's tongue on his face, and, in fact, handle the reptile in any way and carry him around in his pocket. The snake was found by its present owner while strolling near Lily Lake a few weeks ago. He placed it in his pocket and carried it home, and since that time the snake has been his pet. Mr. McIntosh generally has the snake at the Charlotte street store, and shows it to all his friends and numerous

INQUISITIVE SCHOOLBOYS.

Considerable fun is extracted through the medium of this dangerous reptile. Some intimate friends were in the store the other day, when Mr. McIntosh took the snake out of his coat pocket and rubbed its tongue against his face. Although it is not the tongue that "stings," as most people imagine, yet it is a very disagreeable thing to do. One of his friends nearly fainted and could hardly be prevented from seeking a doctor to undo the deadly work he imagined the snake had done. A young lady was suddenly taken by surprise to see the snake appear out of its owner's pocket, and left the store in a hurry. She has not been back since.

Mr. McIntosh is unable to account for his control over snakes, except from the fact that he never had any fear for a reptile of any kind. He feels that once he gets a snake to look him in the eyes he has complete control of it and it will stay with him.

His first knowledge of this power he received ten years ago. Walking through the woods, one day, he accidentally stepped on a snake. Finding what he had done he stooped down and stroked it gently on the back. Then he picked it up, put it in his pocket and carried it home. Here he met great opposition to his new pet, as nobody had any desire to see a snake

CRAWLING ROUND THE HOUSE.

He kept it, however. From that time he has always been greatly interested in all kinds of reptiles.

During the centennial exhibition of 1883 everybody will remember that there was a kind of side show to a circus running on the grounds at the rear of the large building. The attractions were a performing goat, a few other things and a collection of snakes. Mr. McIntosh visited this show and being interested in snakes drew the attention of the regular snake charmer, who suggested with a sarcastic grin, that he pick up one of the snakes. Mr. McIntosh picked up one about six feet in length, and wound it about him to the astonishment of the regular charmer and the audience. Before leaving the city for Ontrrio about three years ago. Mr. McIntosh had seven snakes, many of them of good size, He made them his pets, much the same as a boy would rabbits, or a woman a pug dog, and kept them in his room. The snakes, however,

The upright position, characterized by a general distress, the forward inclination of the trunk, the fixation and elevation of the arms, as if to give the thorax a point of support and to bring into exercise the auxiliary muscles of respiration, is observed always when an obstacle hinders almost completely the contact of air with the respiratory surfaces, whether this obstacle be in the larynx, the trachea (as foreign bodies, false membranes, cicatrices, or tumors, which act either by stopping up the passages or by compression), or in the bronchia or pulmonary vessels (exudates in capillary bronchitis, pneumonia, tuberculosis, emphysema, or pulmonary compression by exudates and pleuritic transudations, pneumothorax, flatulent dyspepsia, ascites, etc.), in asthma and in cardiac affections, especially in those the right side, which then depend principally on extravasations in the pulmonary veins.

The more obtuse the angle formed by the trunk and the surface of the bed, the more intense is the orthopnea. Consumptives are accustomed to remain seated for many hours, with the object of hindering the escape of liquids from cavities through the corresponding bronchia.

Simple Method for Re-Animation.

At a meeting of the last congress of German scientists this subject was discussed, and Dr. H. Frank mentioned that there are but two ways to stimulate the heart—electricity and mechanical concussion of the heart. The first is considered dangerous by him, as it may easily destroy the last power of contraction remaining in the organ. But what is termed "pectoral concussion" is decidedly preferable. Dr. F.'s method is as follows:

He flexes the hands on the wrist to an obtuse angle, places them both near each other in the ileo-cæcal region, and makes vigorous strokes in the direction of the heart and of the diaphragm. These strokes are repeated from fifteen to twenty times, and are succeeded by a pause, during which he strikes the chest over the heart repeatedly with the palm of his hand. In favorable cases this method is early successful, and sometimes a twitching of the lids or the angles of the mouth appears with surprising rapidity as the first sign of returning life. As soon as these symptoms are noted, the simple manipulations above described must be earnestly continued and persevered in from a half to one hour, for, with their cessation, the phenomena indicating beginning return of life also cease. Generally, the face assumes a slight reddish tint, and at the same time a faint pulsation may be felt in the carotids. By this method Dr. F. has seen life return in fourteen cases, among whom were such as had hung themselves, drowned, and asphyxiated by carbonic oxide, and in one case by croup.

Tired Eyes.

People speak about their eyes being fatigued, meaning that the retina, or nerve portion of the brain that does the seeing is fatigued, but such is not the case, as the retina rarely tires. The fatigue is in the inner and outer muscles attached to the eyeball, and the muscle of accommodation which surrounds the lens of the eye. When a near object is to be looked at, this muscle relaxes and allows the lens to thicken, increasing its refractive power. The inner and outer muscles are used in covering the eye on the object to be looked at, the inner one being especially used when a near object is to be looked at. It is in these three muscles mentioned that the fatigue is felt, and relief is secured temporarily by closing the eyes or gazing at far distant objects. The usual indication of strain is a redness of the rim of the eyelid, betokening a congested tion. A flannel shirt exactly like those made for the men, boy's size, worn inside of a dress body and belted in at the waist, is very charming and comfortable beyond imagining.

The duchess is a stately redingote designed for late autumn wear, made of dove-grey soldier's cloth and trimmed with a single row of fine gold and silver passementerie. There is a full drapery of the cloth at the back, gathered closely and applied to the centre forms of the bodice portion. The sleeves are half open, and lined with grey and gold shot surah.

A lady who has given the matter much attention is authority for the declaration that in kissing all men kiss with too much force. A kiss to be appreciated by a girl, she says, must be gentle and not rough, and under no circumstances should have any suggestions of tobacco or John Barleycorn. As the result of comparing notes with many ladies married and engaged, she asserts that the kisses of three-fourths of mankind, husbands lovers and brothers, are "smoky."

Very long scarfs of black lace in various fine delicate patterns are imported and are to be as fashionable as they were a few years ago. These come in lengths which vary from two and one-half to four yards, and some are nearly a yard in width. They are to be worn either in the picturesque fashion of Spanish women, or fastened closely at the throat with a gold or silver lace-pin or clasp set with gems. The ends of some of the longest reach quite to the edge of the skirt hem.

Large Directoire hats with low crowns and projecting brims are imported both in velvet and felt. These are stylish and picturesque for visiting and carriage wear, but for general uses the toque and the English turban will be highly favoured. The "Aureole" hat is another rather striking model for dressy wear. The crown is wreathed with large, full ostrich plumes; and at the edge of the brim is a band of the same plumage, short and fluffy, which surrounds the face like a halo.

Many of the new basques and bodices are lengthened to cover the hips more deeply. The vest buttoned on each side to the corsage, the plastron, the separate waistcoat, the pleated shoulder-pieces, the demure nun's corsage with soft folds lapping each other over the chest, the surplice front crossing from right to left, the round waist with its charming belt adornings, the pointed corsage with revers of all shapes and kinds, each and all, are among the new or repeated fancies of the season. It is almost impossible to go far astray in the design of the bodice, as the variety of models is now so limitless that any graceful style becoming to the wearer is good form. The broad and showy Directoire revers give the effect of breadth, and are seen alike on the simplest and the richest gowns. The high military collars and the deep turn-over models are equally popular.

There are twenty-five miles of shelves in the British Museum reading room.

Col. L. Fontaine of Canton, Miss., has trained a pair of pet bears so that he drives them double to a buggy. He occasionally appears on the streets with them, scaring the horses half out of their wits, and amusing the small boys greatly. The bears amble along at a pretty fair sort of a pace.

John Kaufman of Brazil, Ind., who died suddenly the other day, had a most curious mania for stealing women's shoes. He never stole anything else. A few years ago he was arrested, and forty or fifty pairs of shoes and slippers were recovered. He was imprisoned for a short time for the offence. After his death over sixty pairs of women's shoes were found in the hut where he lived alone.

many of them of good size. He made them his pets, much the same as a boy would rabbits, or a woman a pug dog, and kept them in his room. The snakes, however, had a habit of crawling out of their box and exploring the house, where one of them was found under a mat by the lady of the house. There was a scene, and the snakes were ever after consignad to more appropriate quarters.

Mr. McIntosh intends taking a vacation in the country in a few weeks. If his plans succeed, he will bring back a finer collection of snakes than ever met the appreciative eye of a man in the clutches of delirium tremens.

The Gilbert Islands.

A San Francisco dispatch says that the Germans are taking steps to add the Gilbert archipelago to their other posssessions in the Pacific. This group forms a portion of a chain of small islands stretching between the Philippines and the Fijis. Nearest the former lie the Pelews, then come the Carolines; east and north of the latter are the Marshall Islands, subdivided into the Radack and Ralick; southeast of these are found the Gilbert; finally, south of the Gilbert is the Ellice group, which brings the line toward the Fijis and Samoa. This chain covers a distance of more than 3,000 miles. The dispute between Germany and Spain three years ago as to the ownership of the Carolines caused a more careful defining of the groups. Under the decision of Pope Leo, to whom as arbiter the controversy was referred, the Carolines proper, situated south of the Ladrones, were assigned to Spain, like the Pelews to the west of them. The eastern limit of the Carolines was put at 164°, and dominion beyond that point was conceded to Germany, who promptly took possession of the Marshall Islands, put them under a Commissioner, while a German commercial company on the island of Jaluit took charge of the trade of the group, imposing port fees. It is said that they also put a small tax on the natives, who were accordingly by no means favorably impressed with their new allegiance.

The Pope's decision had at least carefully separated Spanish from German jurisdiction, so that the former extends over an unbroken area, including the Philippines, Pelews, Ladrones, and Carolines; but the extent of German sovereignty did not so distinctly appear. Since then, however, Great Britain and Germany are said to have drawn a line, mutually satisfactory, in this region, so that presumably the formal occupation of the Gilbert Islands accorded with their arrangement. Although the little trading as yet done in that region has fallen more into the hands of Germans than into those of Americans, yet the American Board of Foreign Missions has had its stations established there for more than thirty years. It is stated that of late the religious work in the Marshall and Gilbert groups has been largely or wholly under the charge of the Sandwich Islanders, who can better endure the climate than Americans; but there is a training school for the two groups on the island of Kusaie, in the Eastern Carolines. The Gilbert and the Marshall group were, until the German annexation of the latter, independent, being governed by their own chiefs. These islands are of the usual low coral formation, having few products of importance for export except dried cocoanut, but this attracted German traders to the islands of Jaluit and Sikieb, and the formecan now boast of a German Consular

The Gilbert Islands lie directly on the equator, stretching through several hundred miles of north and south latitude. They include scores of small islands, among the most important being Makin, Maraki, Nanonti, Apamama, Onatoa, and Arorai. On recent German maps the indication of German sovereignty has been distinctly confined to the Marshall group, leaving the Gilbert group unclaimed. But the conference held a year or two ago on the subject of the boundaries in this part of the Pacific between England and Germany has presumably governed the recent action of the Germans, who are said to have established themselves on one island of the Gilbert group, and to have visited others as if with intent to occupy them. The Marshall and Gilbert Islands may properly enough be under the same rule. When the Madrid papers announced the decision of the Pope in the Carolines dispute they conceded that both the Marshall and Gilbert groups were to go to Germany. The process of snapping up groups and single islands in the Pacific has been greatly stimulated by the prospective opening of the isthmus route, in which case even possessions which now seem of little value may possible be turned to some account.

PASSING NOTES.

"Do you enjoy good health?" "Why, yes; to be sure: who doesn't?"

The origin of pools is not known. The Pool of Siloam is probably the first of which history speaks.

At 260 yards the Lepel rifle would go through two men. The French arsenals have enough ammunition to supply each soldier with 2,500 cartridges.

Smallpox and other epidemics are threatening to break out. The more reason why cleanliness should be preached and practised. The scavenger and engineer do more for health than the doctor.

The census of those territories taken in 1885 shows that out of a white population of nearly 50,000 less than 2,000 were foreign born. In Manitoba, with a population of over 100,000, less than twelve per cent. are foreigners and nearly 70 per cent. of the people were born either in Ontario or Manitoba

Near Edgbaston, England, is a pasture where a horse and a goat grazed. Some rude boys amused themselves by throwing stones at the goat and beating it, and were having a fine time when the horse cantered up, kicked, struck, and bit at the boys, and grabbing one young ruffian by the coat collar yanked him clean over the hedge.

We occasionally hear complaints because of the alleged slow growth of Manitoba and the North-West Territories and we would all be glad to see this newer portion of the Dominion make even more rapid progress than it is now making. There is, however, one fact connected with this to be greater Canada which must be gratifying to all true Canadians and that is that the boundless prairies promise to be peopled by those to whom the title of British and Canadian will be something more than a mere empty name.

Dr. Dastre, a French physiologist, who has been experimenting with animals to determine the nature of seasickness, reports that after they had been subjected to various kinds of motion, corresponding to the rolling and pitching of vessels, he found their intestines strangely displaced. He concludes that a similar disturbance produced seasickness on board ship. Cocaine is said to be an excellent remedy. Another French physician who agrees with Dr. Dastre as to the causes of seasickness, claims to have discovered two infallible remedies, one a mixture of atropine and strychnine, and the other caffeine.

We have no reason to feel ashamed of the growth of our North-West. Winnipeg is to-day a thriving city containing upwards

Proud of His Memory.

Brown: I say, Dumley, you haven't forgotten that ten dollar bill you borrowed of me a long time ago, have you?

Dumley (in a hurt tone of voice): Forgotten it, my dear boy? Do you think I'm so weak-minded as all that? I'd rather a man would impugn my credit any day than my memory.

Opposition is what we want, and must have, to be good for anything. Hardship is the native soil of manhood and self-reliance.

Pans of water placed in fruit and berry patches will keep birds from eating the fruit. An English naturalist claims that the reason birds eat cherries and strawberries is because in the blazing heat they get dreadfully thirsty. If the birds can easily get at water they soon leave off taking the fruit.

My son is here with me to-day, and I will ask him for a leaf from his own experience. Stand up, my son, and speak so all the children can hear you. How were you led to the Sabbath school?" Preacher's son (fiercely)—"By the ear."

"My friend," said a tight-fisted banker to a young man who had pulled him out of the water, "I appreciate the fact that you have saved my life and I am prepared to reward you—to reward you liberally for your services. What can I do for you?"

"Well, sir, there was a suit of clothes spoilt," said the rescuer, who was good-natured, though not educated; "that would be about seventeen dollars; then I lost my hat; that would be fifty cents; then I took considerable liquor to keep off a cold, which cost me a quarter. I don't think of anything else, sir."

"But you do not mention the fact that you have saved my life. What can I do for you on that score?"

"Oh, well, call the whole thing eighteen dollars—that's as much as it's worth, I guess."

MANHOOD
How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply privately and radically.

This lecture should be in the hands of every youth and every man in the land.

We have no reason to feel ashamed of the growth of our North-West. Winnipeg is to-day a thriving city containing upwards of 20,000 people, and yet the man is still young who can remember Fort Garry as a Hudson Bay port, surrounded by its beggarly collection of huts. But we say emphatically that even had the development of the North-west proceeded more slowly than it has it would be better so than that it should lose its distinctive British and Canadian character and become a collection of foreign colonies whose people would remain unmoved at the sight of the maple leaf or red cross of St. George.

Hostilities have been resumed in the Soudan, and the forces of the Mahdi have made an attack upon the British garrison at Suakim. There is reason to believe that the troubles at so many points in Africa have been due to a concerted policy on the part of the Arabs, who have discovered in a slowly advancing civilization the danger of serious set-back to the traffic which they have carried on so long and so defiantly. A half-hearted policy on the part of Great Britain at this juncture, such as that which led to the fall of Khartoum, might involve very serious and far-reaching consequences.

Credit is the curse of the working classes in this country. It is the enemy of all thrift. Men and women literally drift into debt and it is only when it is too late they find there is no escape. The facilities for furnishing on credit have much to do with the evil of too early marriages and those who begin married life in debt as a rule never get out of it except by bankruptcy and the insolvent's sponge, and that means, with working men being completely sold out. Men marry on credit and repent on judgment summonses. Then a women often gets into debt without the knowledge of her husband and keeps him in ignorance of proceedings being taken against him tell it be too late. A wife that will go into debt without letting her husband know ought to be divorced, though, to be sure, there are often great temptations when doing so. All sound credit rests on the two bases of property or character, and it is just those who are most destitute of both that rush most easily into debt. If it had not been for credit many would have been comfortable if not wealthy who are now beggars If people could only be persuaded to do without every thing for which they cannot pay in cash the half of life's miseries would disappear.

Michel Eugene Chevreul, the discoverer of margarine, is lying in Paris at the point of death at the extremely advanced age of 102. Most people imagine that this substitute for butter is a recent invention, whereas it was in 1813, seventy-five years ago that Chevreul discovered pig's lard yielded two fats; and one of them, because of the pearly appearance of its potash salt, he called "Margarin," the term being derived from the Greek word for a "pearl-shell." All the world is now familiar with the name, it having been misappropriated by those who manufacture beasts' fat for the butter market, as also by the Governments in legislating for the traffic. Chevreul has been mankind's schoolmaster in fat and soap. It was he, too, who first obtained the pure spermaceti fat from the substance that is mixed with the oil in the head of the great sperm-whale. And talking of margarine we note that under the newly enacted law of England requiring oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter to be called by their right name, the importation of the stuff has greatly decreased, while the importation of butter has very materially increased, proving plainly that the deception practised was largely the cause of the former great demand for olemargarine, butterine, etc.

HOUSEHOLD.

Parental Responsibility.

This sounds old, and yet parents keep right on forgetting their responsibility.

One of the most difficult lessons to be impressed on any mind, is the power and extent of individual influence. In nine cases but of ten, the mother's influence is more lasting in her family than the father's, but both parents are equally responsible in their high and holy callings, and it is a pity that parents are so slow to believe that their children are what they make them.

Now, I want to talk just for a few minutes with you, mothers. It may be dry talk—nothing "funny," but true.

The oak which waves in our forests to-day wes its form, its specie and its tint to the acorn which dropped from its ancestor. Human life extends beyond the three score and ten years which bound its visible existence here. The characters of the dead are inwrought into those of the living; the generations below the sod formed that which now dwells and acts upon the earth. Parents of this generation are molding that which shall succeed it, and distant posterity shall inherit the characteristics which we impress into our children to day. Is it indeed true that the generation crumbling with the dust formed that which now dwells and acts upon the earth? Is it true, that when we ourselves are mingled with it a generation shall be left behind which shall bear our impress; that the happiness of the living are indeed affected by those whose very names are forgotten upon this earth? We must believe it is truly so.

Ten thousand shades of character make an age, ten thousand influences leave the playground to tell upon the nation. In what light then must we regard parental responsibility? Let the parents whose work is yet to do or now in progress ponder it well. If it is true that the happiness of families, the well-being of the nation are in the trust of parents, if parental character produces effects which stretch from time into eternity, which are seen through all the phases of society, commencing around the cradle and extending into the company of seraphim, then surely parental responsibility is a subject worthy of deepest consideration.

As parents, we should not treat lightly our commission, and yet not be over-sensitive with a feeling that such responsibilities are awful. They ask but faithfulness and love, and met by these return a reward, soul touching and unending.

Mischievous Babies

Are a great care to the mother who is cook, housemaid, sewing woman and nurse all at once, and where to put them for safety is a great problem. For my creeping children, I had made a sort of little table, with outward-sloping legs mounted on casters. The top of the table was twenty-two inches square. One half the top was moveable, attached by a pivot. In the centre of the table was a hole just large enough to admit the baby below the arms. When in this, the six-months-old baby could travel as fast as any of the older children. There was no danger of burnt fingers or other hurts, for the table projected two or three inches beyond the little fingers. A slight rim around the edge sufficed to keep toys in reaching distance. Care was taken not to allow the child to become tired. There were no bad results from the use, but I think he would have walked alone sooner without it, as he was a year old before he would attempt to walk where he could not touch his fingers. A better contrivance, because two children can be secured in it at once, is to have a large dry goods chop half of a small, raw onion and two sprigs of parsley. Put a tablespoonful of butter in a sauce-pan, and let heat; put in the onion and parsley with half a cup of flour, stir well until cooked, then add a cupful of soup stock, and stir until a smooth paste. Season with pepper and salt, a little grated nutmeg and the juice of half of a small onion; stir well together, and mix in the pieces of chicken. Mold into croquettes, roll in cracker crumbs, dip in egg, and fry in boiling lard. Garnish with parsley, and arrange standing on a large dish.

TO TOW WHEAT TO EUROPE.

A Scheme from Duluth but one not Likely to Succeed.

A man in Duluth has an invention which he thinks will cheapen by half the cost of transporting grain and lumber from the Northwest to Europe. In his idea there are suggestions of the Leary raft, a canal boat, and a torpedo boat. His plan is to make cigar-shaped cylinders of steel, which are to be loaded in Duluth with grain, sealed up, taken in tow through the lakes to Buffalo, through the Erie Canal to Albany, down the Hudson, and over to Liverpool, without once breaking bulk.

One of these shells is now on the stocks at Duluth, and it will be sent to Liverpool as soon as it is tested and the necessary contracts for towing are made. It is likely, though, that more than one shell will be built before an experimental trip across the ocean is made, as it would not be a complete experiment nor would it pay to take over only one shell. The shells are made as large as the locks of the Erie Canal will permit. That is the limit to the size of any vessel bound from Duluth to New York.

The shells are made of steel plates riveted to each other like a boiler's plates. Inside there is a sheathing to prevent the water from getting into the wheat. That is all there is to the interior. Outside there is a railing around the hatch and a place for a man to stand and steer. The steering apparatus is detachable. The intention is to have a steersman on each shell while going through the Erie Canal and other canals on the way from Duluth to New York, but at New York to lash the shells together and tow them across to Liverpool, taking the quietest time of the year to go and the easiest routes, without an effort to make any quicker transit than a sailing vessel would, though in time improvement might come that would allow quicker transportation.

The saving would be in elevator charges, in the cost of loading and unloading at Buffalo and New York, and in the reduced cost of towing, as it would be cheaper to tow the shells over than to load the wheat on a steamer and take it across. The grain comes by rail from the wheat fields of Minnesota, Dakota, and Manitoba to Duluth, where it is put in the grain elevators until ready for shipment. At present it is taken from there through the lakes to Buffalo, elevated again, put in canal boats, taken to New York, again elevated, put into a steamer, and sent to Liverpool. The waves can wash over the shells all they wish, as the shells are hermetically sealed, and the water will not get in unless the seams start.

The main trouble will be in keeping the tow together in the ocean. The waves may break the tow line or a storm may arise and swamp everything. The towing steamer might have to part with the shells to save itself, but they would float, and though the chance of picking them up after they were once cut loose would be small, there would be a possibility of it.

If this invention turns out well it will cut the cost of transporting wheat from Duluth to Liverpool five to twelve cents a bushel.

ON A FEVER TRAIN.

Incidents of a Trip Northward of Panic-Stricken Refugees.

Never, says a correspondent, did man take a ghastlier ride than our correspondent when he left the Union depot with the train of yellow fever refugees from Florida.

The stop in Atlanta, the serving of lunches and the excitement of the city, seemed to have infected the crowd, and from the time the train pulled out of the depot it was apparent that Dr. Guiteras had lost control of them. Men and women were nervous to an uncontrollable degree. A half dozen stronger spirits would organize on each car and practically take charge of it. If a passenger complained of feeling unwell there was instant demand for him to be put off the train. In two cases this demand would have been enforced by main strength but for the determination of two or three humane and determined men. In one car a woman was taken with a chill, which in a few moments was succeeded by fever. She was immediately taken from one car into another, and the car she was ejected from was barricaded and no one allowed to go out or in. This trick was soon discovered, and as the rumour passed that there were sick people on this car, a quarantine was immediately established in every other car. The consequence was that before the train reached the Carolina line every car was practically barricaded against every other car, and there was quarantine all along the line. Having been locked up for nearly two days and nights, without sleep, excited by the fears of the plague, hungry and thirsty, it is remarkable that there were not actual tragedies enacted on the train.

A curious and ludicrous effect was produced at almost every station. The crowd of loafers that usually hang about depots came peering about the car windows to investigate the train. Upon being informed that it was the yellow fever train, they fled like sheep, and as the contagion spread, one could see from the car window whole villages scudding around corners, and taking for the woods, as the dread train moved its slow and ghastly length along. At Westminster, or near Westminster, S. C., four of the passengers on the train were missing. It was presumed that in some way they had escaped from the car after the train had pulled out, and taken their chances by a jump from the cars and a dash into the woods.

A very strange thing was done upon the arrival of the refugees at Hendersonville. Dr. Guiteras removed all restraint upon reaching this point. There was no quarantine established, and the excursionists who had been so carefully guarded all the way from Florida to this point were at liberty to go where they pleased. There being no quarantine against Hendersonville, and no quarantine there, there is nothing to prevent the 400 refugees, seven of whom are down with the fever, going where they please. They are scattering widely.

When the train load of yellow-faced, gaunt, and nervous refugees were dumped at Hendersonville's gates a scene was witnessed which rivalled the most affecting scenes of war times. Men who, in the rush at Jacksonville, had been separated from their families, hustled into cars and locked up, and who had made the entire trip without knowing whether or not their families were on board, upon being given their freedom rushed madly from one group to another in the too frequently vain search for their loved ones, until, worn out and completely undone from loss of sleep and nervous prostration, they sank to the ground unable to go further, and remained there until the relief committee which had been before he would attempt to walk where he could not touch his fingers. A better contrivance, because two children can be secured in it at once, is to have a large dry goods box mounted on casters. Remove the nails projecting on the inside, and pad the sides with old comforts or cotton batting ; cover with cretonne or furniture calico. If two or three six inch square windows are left in it, it becomes a veritable doll house, and few children will refuse to go into it. However, it must be always understood that it is a house for good children. If the child is put there for punishment it will never be thought a nice house again. One woman utilized the sawn into portions of a sugar hogshead to keep two lively youngsters out of harm's way.

Any of these arrangements saves the mother a great deal of worry and the child a great deal of suffering. Every large city daily has accounts of more or less little children scalded or bruised or burned, falling from windows or drinking lye or other poisons that nobody thought the child would touch. I am acquainted with a woman, now nearly sixty years old, who has never been able to either speak or hear since the time she toddled out where her mother was making soap and drank some strong lye.

Recipes.

WAFFLES.—Beat three eggs very light, to which add one pint of rich milk, two tablespoonfuls of butter, a teaspoonful of salt, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, with flour sufficient to make a soft batter. Bake quickly in buttered waffle-irons, and serve very hot.

BAKED APPLES.—Pare and core large, juicy apples. Fill the cavities with sugar and a little lemon juice and thin slices of the rind ; put them in a pan with a little water, and sprinkle sugar over the tops ; baste them often, and when done, set them away to cool. Serve with cream.

BROILED PHEASANT.—Place on a steamer over hot water until tender ; rub over with salt, pepper and butter ; lay on a greased gridiron, and set over live coals ; broil and turn until both sides are brown. Take up, put on a pan and cover with butter. Put in a very hot oven ten minutes, and serve with currant jelly.

BOILED CORNED BEEF.—Put a piece of corned beef in a pot with cold water to cover, let come to a boil, and set on the back of the stove to boil slowly. Let simmer fou hours—longer if very large. When nearly done, scrape a dozen carrots and drop in. When done, dish, and arrange the carrots around. Serve with small pickles.

TOMATO SOUP.—Peel a dozen large tomatoes, boil until they are thoroughly done, and press through a sieve. To a quart of tomato pulp add a teaspoonful of soda. Put an ounce of butter in a sauce-pan, and heat, stirring in a small tablespoonful of flour ; when cooked, pour in a pint of hot milk. Season with a little cayenne pepper and salt. Throw in a handful of broken crackers, let boil, and add the tomato pulp. Heat without boiling, and serve.

FRIED LIVER WITH BROWN SAUCE.—Cut the liver in slices, cover with boiling water, and let stand five minutes ; take out of the water and wipe dry ; dredge with flour, salt and pepper. Put two slices of fat bacon in a frying pan, put the liver in, fry brown on one side and then on the other. Place on a hot dish with the bacon, cut in small pieces. To the grease in the pan add a tablespoonful of flour, and stir until brown ; pour in half a pint of soup stock, a tablespoonful of Worcestershire sauce and mushroom catsup each, with salt to taste ; pour over the liver and serve.

CHICKEN CROQUETTES.—Boil one large chicken, with an onion thro vn in the water. When done, cut the chicken in small pieces; once cut loose would be small, there would be a possibility of it.

If this invention turns out well it will cut the cost of transporting wheat from Duluth to Liverpool five to twelve cents a bushel. That will be a big item when multiplied by the millions of bushels yearly exported from the Northwest. The saving by not having to break bulk at Buffalo would alone amount to three to five cents a bushel, and if the New York to Liverpool part of the experiment is a failure there remains a large probability of cutting the wheat rate between Duluth and New York while navigation on the Erie Canal is open.

This, if successful, will be a much bigger thing than Mr. Leary's experiment of bringing lumber from Nova Scotia here in rafts, as it will change the whole lake trade. If successful, the lake schooners which are now making enough profit in three good years to pay for themselves will have to come down in their freight rates, and the railroads running to Duluth will be banned, while the all-rail freight routes most will suffer. There is a fight between Duluth and Chicago now for the wheat of the Northwest. Duluth has the advantage of shorter distances of railroad transportation from the wheat fields, while Chicago has the larger capital and the older business. Duluth has large ore shipments in addition to the grain, and, though the ore is not shipped to Europe a cheap rate of transportation would enable the ore companies to send it to New York. It already goes to Cleveland. On the return the shells might be used to take coal to the Northwest. Most of the coal consumed in the Northwest comes from Buffalo, the freight west being coal, and east grain and ore.

A Trifle Skeptical.

Bobby—I learned that the world is round, and turns on hinges like that globe in the parlor.

Minister—Well, what did you think of that?

Bobby—I think they're asking me to believe a good deal for a small boy.

Education in Toronto.

Toronto is steadily advancing in educational matters. The University has had two additional professorships endowed by the city, and is erecting a large and handsome building for the School of Practical Science ; a new Ladies' College has been opened under the auspices of the Baptist University, and a College of Music has been opened under the direction of Mr. F. H. Torrington, who has been for sixteen years organist of the Metropolitan Methodist Church and conductor of the Philharmonic Society. In its system of teaching and the scope of its departments, the College resembles the University and provides a practical education, for both professional and amateur, in all branches of music.

Two young Germans in Berlin fought a duel with tricycles. Starting at 300 yards apart, they charged full tilt against each other, with slight injury to themselves and serious hurts to their machines. Their honor was satisfied.

for their loved ones, until, worn out and completely undone from loss of sleep and nervous prostration, they sank to the ground unable to go further, and remained there until the relief committee which had been organized by the citizens carried them to the hospitable homes of some of the villagers, where they were cared for. Mothers with babies in their arms, and children clinging to their knees, as they cried for food and water and a resting place, were vainly searching among the crowd for missing husbands. Children were searching for parents, and parents for children. It took the whole day to get the refugees comfortably quartered, and this was not accomplished until long lines of tents had been pitched in every part of the town.

The Kindlier Country Way.

Now it is inevitable that the kindliest people living in cities should fall into a greater reserve of manner toward strangers than that developed in the country, where people know all about their neighbors. In a city you cannot nod to everybody you meet on the street ; there is not time for it. You cannot even call on those who live in the same block with you. You may be living in the next house to a professional gambler and have no means of ascertaining the fact. All these things produce in people from the cities a habit of more guarded intercourse, which is certainly less pleasant than the kindlier country way, but is not easy to lay aside. Again, the mere possession of a new acquaintance, as such, is a privilege to one who habitually lives an isolated life, but is not a thing so eagerly desired by those who live in a crowd all the time, and have rather to acquire the habit of defending themselves against numbers. Indeed a great deal of what is called hospitality in thinly settled regions and new communities has no especial unselfishness about it ; where neighors and guests are few it is really the visitor who confers the favor. To give the pleasure of his company becomes in that case a phrase of some meaning.

These lines describe that condition of perfect health which all men and women wish to enjoy. To be able to think clearly, to incline to do noble acts, to live long and joyously, we must be free from the domination of disease. By taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery we may, by purifying the blood, escape consumption, general debility, and weakness, and all blood and skin diseases, and verify the truth of poetry as well as fact.

Minutes of last regular and special sessions (excepting those illegally held) were read and on correction were adopted. The correction was the consertion of the motion adopting of the specifications of John-st sewer which was omitted.

Petition was presented from H.B. Wray, W. D. Madden and H. B. Sherwood, asking the deepening of drain on Dundas-st north from Donald-st east to neighborhood of Light's factory, which has always been too shallow to carry off the water. Deputy-reeve Lapum moved that the prayer be granted. Seconded by coun. Aylsworth. Adopted.

Mr Edwards appeared before the council asking for the opening of Robert-st. He wanted the street opened up to the railway track in accordance with former agreement of couucil. Coun Aylsworth moved that it be opened to the railway property. Coun Bowen seconded the motion and it carried.

A communication was read from Mr. Jno. Briggs stating that, owing to his gate being taken off on Hallowe'en, his cow had been impounded. He asked refund of poundage. Coun Bowen, seconded by coun Aylsworth, moved that it be granted. Carried.

A letter was read from James Harmer, setting forth that he had sustained injury through there not being a light placed on Bridge-st, of which he had notified the council before. It had been referred to committee he understood, but he had heard nothing further of the matter. It was referred to street committee to report, on motion of the deputy-reeve and reeve.

The report was ordered to be fyled.

The street committee reported an expenditure of $81.90 for the past three weeks. Adopted.

The poor and sanitary committee reported from Sept 3rd to date, showing an expenditure of 11.83; balance due the committee of $1.83.

On motion of coun Carson, a complaint regarding the assessment of Jas Blewett was referred to the Finance committee.

A similar complaint was read from Hugh Duncan, and was also referred to Finance committee.

Coun. Carson asked if clerk gave assessor bills dated 1887 for this year; he knew such was the case. The clerk said the schedules were furnished by the county.

Deputy-reeve Lapum submitted the tax bill of the Salvation Army, which was referred to the Finance committee.

Deputy-reeve Lapum brought up matter of Mr Johnson's horse, which, through opening of his gate, came over to Napanee, and was impounded. He asked refund of poundage. Deputy-reeve Lapum moved, seconded by coun. Bowen, that it be granted. On being put the vote resulted in a tie; the mayor voted against the motion and it was lost.

Chief Allen said that some boys had been playing truant and causing trouble at school. They had a pistol there at last time and fired several shots. There were eight boys in the town that should be severely dealt with as they had been causing much trouble. The trustees wished him to lay complaint. He desired expression of the council before taking action as he did not wish to be put in for costs.

Coun. Carson asked, on behalf of Mr. Taylor, that he be allowed to pay $15 down and $1 per month in advance afterwards for billiard tables. Referred to Finance committee, with power to act.

Coun. Aylsworth moved, seconded by deputy-reeve Lapum, that the street committee be empowered to deepen the drain on Dundas st north from Richard-st east to the creek at Mrs. Thompson's,—a continuation of the drain asked for by petitioners above.

Coun. Aylsworth claimed that the work should be done as it was of great benefit to the whole of the residents.

Coun Carson opposed it in the ground that it was wrong in principle to drain one portion of the town at expense of the whole.

Coun. Davis suggested that a tile drain be built in centre of the street, which he thought could be laid down at little expense over the other work.

The motion carried.

Accounts were presented and dealt with as follows: Robt Light, $363.90, G. B. Joy, $88.45, and Rathbun Co, $174.47, each, for lumber, to street committee; from Ferguson Bros, nails, $20.13, to same committee; Thos Butcher, digging drain, etc, $9, ditto; Treasurer's vouchers, $93.48, paid; Jos Plumley, carting, $5.20, paid; Boyle & Son, copper, etc, $1,20, to Fire, Water and Gas Com; Thos Scott, impounding cattle, $7.50, paid; constable Storms, tramps care and tickets $4.30, and salary $37 50, paid; P. M. McCabe, special constable, $1.50, paid.

Coun. Davis moved, seconded by deputy-reeve Lapum, that Robt Light be granted an advance of $100 and G. B. Joy $50 as soon as the treasury will allow, on order of the street committee.

An advance of $15 was ordered to be made the poor and sanitary committee.

Council then adjourned.

DAVIS, THE GLASSWORKS MAN.

Leaves Town Indignant—He Visits Port Hope on the Same Mission—Is he a Fraud?

Naturally Mr. Davis was not over-pleased with many of the remarks made at the meeting against his proposition. From the manner in which the meeting supported the scheme he apparently believed he had baited the townspeople nicely. But his action in making a purchase of the old glassworks knocked the botton out of the whole affair. Even those who had in a measure sided with the old gentleman gave him a rather cold shoulder after this. The next morning, when asked by Mr. Douglas why he acted so foolishly in announcing the purchase of Mr. Herring's works he said "I wanted to let him down easily," and further stated that the price to be paid was $3000.

As stated before Mr. Davis was here years ago and worked for a time in the glassworks. As far as we can learn he was one of the promoters At the starting he was here a few weeks, and then he left, the public did not know why. About six months afterwards he again visited Napanee and in company with Mr. Douglas had a look through the works, which by this time were running nicely. Together they returned to the former's store. Considerable conversation followed, during which Mr. Davis informed our townsman that inside two years Mr. Herring would be worth nothing if the works were carried on as they were then being. Whether the man knew what he was talking about we cannot say, but the works were closed inside that time.

Upon reaching Napanee three weeks ago, he at once called upon Mr. Douglas and told him that he was on his way to Milwaukee to oversee the building of a large glass factory. Our townsman told him he had struck Napanee in a good time. There was an agitation afoot looking to securing additional factories. Davis said he had no idea of starting here. At Montreal he was told that Napanee was moving in the matter of encouraging factories and he thought he would step off and learn what was being done. Mr. Douglas asked him to remain over a day or two; something might be done for him should he start a factory for the manufacture of bottles, etc. Davis said he could not; he had only the privilege to lay over one day and on Thursday morning he would have to proceed on his journey to Milwaukee as the plans for the works there had preceded him and he did not wish to be too far behind them. However Mr. Douglas prevailed upon him to remain and introduced him to Coun. Madden, who had the bonus committee and a few citizens called together—the result being that the public meeting was held on Friday night.

At the informal meeting it was agreed, so it is held by the councillors, that should his proposition not to be entertained by the public meeting that Davis fare to Milwaukee would be paid. At the meeting it was entertained and so on Saturday when Davis applied for his passage to Milwaukee he was told that such was not the agreement. At being refused the ticket, Davis was indignant and left for Port Hope. The Port Hope Times would like to know who furnished the mysterious stranger with the railway ticket. We cannot say, but do know that Napanee did not.

THE AUTUMN ASSIZES.

On Thursday of last week at half-past eleven o'clock the fall assizes were opened before Mr. Justice Rose. R. C. Clute, of Belleville, acted for the Crown, while, in addition to the local bar, Walter Cassels, Q. C., W. A. Reeve, Q. C., and Mr. McKenzie of Toronto; John McIntyre, Q.C., of Kingston and Wm. Kerr, Q.C., of Cobourg, were present on behalf of the various litigants.

The Grand Jury embraced the following residents of the county: J. Hayden, Foreman; W. Baird, J. B. Blanchard, T. Clancy, Lewis Doller, James Fraser, Stewart Millsap, Wm. Millsap, James Miller, S. McKeown, T. E. McDonough, Michael Nolan, Thomas A. Percy, W. H. Perry, Lawrence Sharp, Lewis H. Stover, Norman Storms, A. B. Sills, Nelson Sills, Colin A. Schryver, B. B. Vanslyck, Edward Wright, Richard Wright and Daniel Wright.

After the Grand Jury had been duly sworn, Judge Rose briefly addressed the members, telling them that they had but little to do, as the Sheriff had presented him with a pair of white kid gloves, emblematic of the purity of the county. But one case had to be dealt with by them and that was a case of stabbing. The jury were carefully instructed as to their duty, after which they retired to investigate the case to be brought before them.

The docket was by no means a lengthy one there being but four on the jury list, viz:

Howard vs Davy.—John McIntyre. Q. C. for the plantiff and Deroche & Madden for the defendant.

Hodgson Bros. vs McCargar.—S. B. Burdett for plaintiff and Clute & Williams for the defendant.

Proctor vs Porte et al.—Wm. Kerr, Q. C. for plaintiff and J. W. Gordon and F. E. Titus for defendants.

Sexsmith vs Glasgow & London Insurance Co'y.—Preston & Ruttan for plaintiff and Smith, Rae & Greer for defendants.

There was but one non-jury case, that of Herring vs the Canada Permanent Loan & and Savings Co'y et al. E. J. Hooper appeared for the plaintiff, and Jones Bros & MacKenzie and Blake, Lasn, Cassels & Holman acted for the various defendants.

The first case called was that of Howard vs Davy—An action arising over a dispute about the right of way over the east half of lot twenty-two in the first concession of South Fredericksbugh. The case is between relatives and like most of family rows, grew out of a very small matter. In this case the starting point was a difference over a line fence. Mary Hall Howard is the plaintiff and Alberta Davy is the defendant. Judge Rose reseved his decision.

The fourth case on the list, that of Sexsmith vs the Glasgow Insurance Company, was settled by a consent verdict being entered for the plaintiff for $1050 without costs.

The case of Proctor vs Porte is a suit from [illegible] tion of the homestead not included in the mortgage to the company. In consideration for so doing, Mr Herring has for eight months the right to sell the whole or any portion of the property at rates and terms agreed on and apply all such monies in the reduction of the mortgage, he to have any surplus. In the meantime Mr. English to collect the rents and pay the taxes, receiving five per cent for the work, and account to the company for the sums received. Each party to pay their own costs.

Court adjourned at half-past nine on Friday evening.

On Saturday morning the jurors re-assembled and after roll call received their pay, were discharged and the fall assizes were at an end.

Ode to Canada.

The following patriotic poem is from the pen of Robert Matheson, A. M., formerly Principal of the Napanee High School. Mr Matheson is now a resident of Chicago, and editor of The British-American, a very neatly printed and spirited weekly published in that city. Our friend has bloomed into a fine poet since his residence west, and it will be seen that he still retains his patriotic ardor for the land of his birth.

Swift as the lightning's vivid beam
Flasheth from east to west,
So runs the thrill of brotherhood
In each Canadian breast.

Instinctive as the needle's flight
To its magnetic pole,
So turns each true Canadian heart
As to its destined goal.

As graven on each exiled palm
The name of Zion shone,
So deep enshrined in ev'ry heart
Is Canada's proud throne.

Whene'er the honor of our land
Is touched by foreign foe
There leaps to life a fervid flame,
A patriotic glow.

From ocean shore to ocean shore
Her wide domain extends,
From inland sea to frozen pole
Her kingdom never ends.

The wave that frets Atlantic coast
That laves Pacific shore,
The iceberg in the Arctic seas
Her scepter floateth o'er.

Her deep soil, tickled by the hoe,
Shall laugh with harvest mirth,
Her boundless prairies yet shall fill
The garners of the earth.

Hurrah, hurrah for Canada,
The young, the free, the brave,
In all her grand Dominion
Her flag floats o'er no slave.

O God of Nation, be the guide
To lead our nation on,
Should North and South as kindred drops
Be mingled into one;

Or linked with adamantine bond
With noble motherland;
Or as youngest among nations
We independent stand,

May Canada's glad mission be
To aid the coming dawn,
When like an overflowing sea
The gospel tide flows on,

And man to man a brother is,
And nations disappear,
And all are one in Christ's wide fold,
Love banishing all fear.

proposition not to be entertained by the public meeting that Davis fare to Milwaukee would be paid. At the meeting it was entertained and so on Saturday when Davis applied for his passage to Milwaukee he was told that such was not the agreement. At being refused the ticket, Davis was indignant. He told Mr. Douglas, that they had treated him shabbily ; they had agreed to pay his ticket to Milwaukee and should do so. Mr. Douglas questioned him pretty closely regarding his having a ticket to Milwaukee. Davis told him he had ; that it was a second class one and that he had burnt it. In corroboration of this he appealed to Brock Leary, who said that after the meeting on Wednesday night Davis came to the Brisco House and stated that as he had to remain over he would destroy his ticket. Brock says he protested, telling him it was good, but the old gentleman said "No" and with that threw it, along with other papers, into the stove.

Saturday Davis told Mr. Douglas that he would leave Sunday morning for Milwaukee. Sunday afternoon Mr. Douglas walked down town and called at the Brisco House to see if Davis had gone. He was astonished to find him still there. Davis said that as the committee had not made good his ticket he would go back to Montreal and from there go to Milwaukee by C. P. R. He could not do anything here for four weeks and he could go on to Milwaukee and get the proposed works underway.

That Davis is an adventurer we have no doubt. The Mr. Hunter he spoke of has been written to by the town clerk. Whether anything will arise out of the correspondence is yet to be seen, but of Davis we do not expect to hear or see anything again.

Davis Visits Port Hope.

A few days after being here he turned up at Port Hope and worked his game pretty well. Evidently the people there had noticed that he had been here and asked him regarding it. Davis said he would not locate at Napanee even if $100,000 was raised. Why he did not say, but we presume that it was because his fare to Milwaukee was not paid. The Port Hope people took hold of Davis proposition and entered into an agreement whereby they agreed to provide site and a frame building 60x70 suitable for the business, with exemption from taxation for ten years. In consideration of this Davis agreed that his company would erect whatever additional buildings might be required, provide all the plant and machinery, and employ a minimum of 500 hands at a proposed expenditure of $1200 per day. The Port Hope papers "waxed eloquent" over the prospect. The Guide stated that the works were expected to be in operations early in January, 1889.

Is He a Fraud ?

A man named R. Davis, supposed to be the same individual, visited Penetanguishene, Owen Sound, Listowel, St. Thomas and other places, some years ago, and attempted the starting of glassworks. It was then window glass and not bottles as now proposed. Whether they were to be run by "gas" we cannot say, but of such Davis proved to be largely possessed. At Penetang he worked his game so well that he got a company formed and attempted to start glassworks. Davis proved a fraud of the first water and succeeded in getting into the good graces and books of every business man in town. He made them believe that they had the finest sand in the country for glass. The company built quite extensive buildings and got so far as to melt, but then discovered that Davis did not know very much about it. Davis was tarred and feathered.

The Ontario says :—"The "Mr Davis" who was building glassworks in different Ontario towns, left Port Hope for Milwaukee to purchase a plant for $14,000.00. The fendant. Judge Rose reseved his decision.

The fourth case on the list, that of Sexsmith vs the Glasgow Insurance Company, was settled by a consent verdict being entered for the plaintiff for $1050 without costs.

The case of Proctor vs Porte is a suit from East Northumberland and is of no interest to our readers.

In the suit of Hodgson Bros. vs McCargar, the matter was referred by consent to S. S. Lazier, Local Master at Napanee under section 101 of the Judicature Act. H. M. Deroche appeared for S. B. Burdette, plaintiff's solicicitor, and R. C. Clute represented the defendant.

The greater part of Friday was taken up with the hearing of the East Northumberland case which resulted in a verdict for the defendants.

At this stage the Grand Jury presented the following report :

The Grand Jurors of our Soverign Lady the Queen at this court of assize for the county of Lennox and Addington beg leave to report:

That we feel deeply indebted to your Lordship for the address to us at the opening of the court respecting the indictment to be laid before us, and our other duties as grand jurors, an address remarkable for its lucidity. That we feel proud to have you the recipient of the emblem of purity from the hands of the sheriff, indicating in this instance a comparative absence of crime in this our county.

That we have visited the gaol, inspected it thoroughly and find everything in connection with the duties of the officers thereof in a very satisfactory condition.

That we wish to call the attention of the proper authorities to the very bad state of privy vaults of the gaol and court house, and the necessity from a sanitary point of view of an immediately improvement in them either introducing earth closets or water. And that the court house floor requires to be more efficiently matted to decrease the noise caused by walking.

That we wish to take this means of conveying to the crown counsel, R.C. Clute, Esq., our thanks for his assistance to us and the kind and courteous manner in which it was rendered.

That the sheriff, clerk and other officers of the court cheerfully rendered to us any assistance required.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

Signed,

James S. Haydon, Foreman.

Dated at the Court House Napanee, Nov 2nd, 1888

In replying to the report Judge Rose took occasion to refer to the disgraceful condition of the court room. He said that it was one of the worst in the Province, being poorly ventilated and totally inadequate to the wants of the county. He suggested that the county council chamber should be thrown into the court room and other improvements made, including the building of a new council chamber and residence for the gaol officials. He urged the county council to deal with the matter at once and threw out the hint that they might get themselves into trouble if they did not do so.

After disposing of the above, the only criminal charges, two against an old man by the name of Smith, for stabbing a couple of men at Fish Point, on Amherst Island, in August last, were disposed of. The particulars were given in The Express at the time. Both of the victims were in court and in giving evidence admitted that the fault was their own. R. C. Clute for the crown and H. M. Deroche for the prisoner. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty in the first case, and then were re-sworn and gave a formal verdict of not guilty in the second one, the evidence being the same on both charges. The prisoner was accordingly discharged.

On Friday evening the case of the Canada Permanent Co. English was taken up. Judge advised a settlement after the case stated to him and an hour was spent ing to come to terms. Then the case started again, and again Judge Rose a settlement. Finally, after over two of skirmishing, the parties came to an ment whereby Mr Herring has opportunity to redeem the property. In the place the sale was confirmed. Mr Herring has to pay Mr English a bonus of $50 and a month and to forth with deed him that Underground Explorers.

About two weeks ago L. M. Vrooman and Isaiah Loyst, of Sheffield, accompanied by Mr. Green, of Kennebec, started from Tamworth with the determination to find out the mystery regarding the outlet of Little Gull Lake, about eight miles north of that village. The water seemed to disappear through a subterranean passage and during the present low water this was found to be the case as the opening is now in full view. About three hundred feet from Little Gull Lake lies Puzzle Lake and a passage similar to the one opening from the former opens into the latter. Vrooman is prospecting for iron ore and thought it worth his while to go through this passage "to see what he could see." After much persuasion Loyst consented to accompany him—but Green was too much afraid of snakes to make the venture. He volunteered however to get pine knots for the others and to raise an alarm if anything happened, so the others started. They drove out a large number of bats much to Green's alarm, but did not find any snakes. At present a small stream of water goes through the passage. The explorers had a difficult time in working their way through, the opening being very small in some places and in others the footing was anything but good. Shortly after entering the passage Loyst was struck in the face by a huge bat and he yelled so loudly that Green thought that the explorers had been attacked by snakes. They were very glad to see daylight again and don't want to go through a similiar experience. No iron ore was found. It is said that about forty years ago and old trapper went through the same passage—but we cannot vouch for the truth of the story. Certain it is that Messrs. Vrooman and Loyst were exceedingly venturesome.

Western Methodist Church.

The Y. P. A. is getting in shape for the winter season's entertainments.

The Sabbath School have announced the annual entertainment for Christmas night.

Next Sunday evening the Rev. E. N. Baker will preach a sermon to young women.

Several new additions have been made to the popular choir of this church, increasing its efficiency.

Regular service next Sunday. Love feast at 9 ; preaching at 10.45 ; Sabbath school at 12 o'clock ; preaching at 7 p. m. ; Sacrament after evening service.

Miss Maggie Bailey who has for some time efficiently acted as organist, is about leaving for Toronto conservatory of music. During her absence Miss Cook, neice of Mayor Cook will preside over the organ.

For some time the attendance at the Sunday services have been so large that it has been compelled to be seated in the gallery. Now some of the regular attendants have taken sittings there.

The new parsonage will shortly be completed. The second coat of plaster has been put on this week, and the painting, etc., will be proceeded with at once. It is expected that in a six week's time the pastor's family will move in.

Five weeks Rev. E. N. Baker has conducted a series of revival meetings in the church. He has worked alone as far as ministerial help is concerned. A number of the members of the church have, however, aided him considerably. The result is that an excellent work has been done ; souls have been converted and lukewarm christians revived. The work has been conducted quietly and earnestly.

CHAPTER XIV.—TRUE TO EACH OTHER.

The police had not been idle during the day of the inquest, or during that day on which Mr. Belfield was making his first experiment in the art of window-cleaning. The usual machinery had been at work, and with the usual result of failure during the first forty-eight hours of pursuit. The first few days in such a hunt are generally blank.

Markham, the detective, had not gone back to London after the inquest. He relied on subordinate intelligence, assisted by photography, to track the suspected criminal. His own work he felt lay in the neighberhood of Chadford, where the final links in the chain of evidence were to be put together. Lord St. Austell was still at the Bridge Hotel, keeping very quiet, but ready at all seasons to confer with Mr. Markham.

* * * * * * *

Sir Adrian spent the first day of his imprisonment in a listlesss indifference as regarded himself or his own convenience, but keenest anxiety about his brother. He had Mr. Gresham, the solicitor, with him upon the evening of his arrest and talked over the evidence given at the inquest with his gentleman, but committed himself to statement or admission whatever.

"You have to deal with the evidence as it stands, Gresham," he said. "I admit nothing about myself or my brother."

"I am sorry to say, Sir Adrian, that unless you can disprove John Grange's statement, you tacitly admit yourself guilty of perjury."

"I am not in a position, at present, to disprove Grange's statement; but I think I have as good a right to be believed as he has."

"On any indifferent matter, your word would doubtless be taken in preference to his; but on a question of life and death for your brother, the statement of any disinterested witness would be preferred to yours."

"What am I to do in my brother's interest? I do not care about myself."

"In both your interests we must try to secure Distin. I will telegraph to him directly the office is open to-morrow morning."

Mr. Distin's fame as a criminal lawyer was not unknown to Sir Adrian Belfield, and it seemed to him well that in this struggle with Fate he should have the best assistance that training and hereditary instinct could afford. Distin had been suckled upon criminal law, and cradled in the Old Bailey. No doubt Distin was the man.

It was a shock to Sir Adrian, therefore, when Mr. Gresham came into his room next morning—soon after the coffee and hot rolls which an obsequious official had brought over from the Ring of Bells—carrying Mr. Distin's reply telegram: "Sorry I cannot accept your retainer. Am already engaged by Colonel Deverill."

"This is unlucky for us, Sir Adrian. It is bad enough not to have Distin with us; but it is worse to have him against us."

"You can get some one else, I suppose, if you are not strong enough yourself to protect our interests."

"I am not a criminal lawyer, Sir Adrian; but perhaps my regard for your family may stand in the place of experience at the Old Bailey. I am not afraid to undertake your defence if you will trust me."

"I would rather trust you than any other member of your profession."

The inquiry before the magistrates involved a recapitulation of the evidence that had been given before the Coronor, except in the case of Sir Adrian, whose lips were now sealed, and who sat apart, with a constable standing near his chair.

The Doctor repeated his statement. Colonel Deverill once again declared his conviction that the body found in the Abbey river was that of his younger daughter, and again swore to the rings which she had worn. Again Mrs. Marrable, with evident unwillingness, identified the missing Persian rug. The important question of indentity was fully established in the minds of the county magistrates, as it had been in the minds of the Coroner and his jury.

The next question was how the deceased had come by her death.

That she had not drowned herself was established already by the evidence of the surgeon. That she had been killed by a blow upon the temple, and had been thrown in the river after death, was indisputable. Mr. Tompion cross-examined the medical witness in the endeavour to shake his testimony upon this point, but the attempt was obviously half-hearted and futile.

Mrs. Marrable was severely handled in cross-examination by Mr. Distin. She admitted that Mr. Belfield had been disturbed in mind since his wife's disappearance, and had seemed altogether an altered man; that he had avoided the rooms his wife had occupied, and had never been heard to mention her name; all this had been thought only natural in a gentleman whose wife had run away from him. She admitted that Sir Adrian's behaviour on the morning of Mrs. Belfield's disappearance had caused some talk in the household. One of the men-servants had met him on the stairs going up to his room, early in the morning, and had been struck by his dejected countenance.

"Was that before Mrs. Belfield's disappearance was known to the household?" asked Distin.

"Two hours before."

Mr. Gresham objected that this was not evidence. It was only an impression derived from another person.

"We can call the servant who made the remark," said Distin.

At this moment there was a movement, and the sound of voices at the further end of the room, near the door opening to the street, and then the crowd made way for a tall man in a loose overcoat with a fur collar, who came slowly up to the magistrates' table. A silence of wonder came upon the whole assembly, which was broken only by a faint cry from Lady Belfield, who had risen, pale as death, at the approach of her younger son.

"Valentine," she cried piteously.

"Perhaps it would be as well to hear my evidence before you waste time upon details," said Valentine Belfield.

He too was pale, but he was thoroughly self-possessed, confronting all those eager faces calmly, as one whose mind had fully realised the worst that could befall him, and who was prepared to endure it in the full strength of his manhood.

"I am here to answer for the death of my wife," he said, gravely and quietly, standing like a rock, with his face towards the bench, and with an air of seeing no one but the magistrates who sat there. "It was I who killed her."

fell at my feet—dead. I hardly know whether she breathed after she fell, for I was unconscious for some minutes after her fall. I believe I fainted.

"When I recovered my senses my brother was in the room. He told me that my wife was dead, and urged me to make the fact public at once, and to exonerate myself from any darker crime than that of which I was guilty. The crime of an unpremeditated blow, which had proved fatal. Had I been wise or reasonable, I should have taken my brother's advice; but I was maddened at the thought of my wife's treason and my own peril. I wanted to save myself from the danger of an inquiry. My statement might not be believed, my crime might be called murder. I thought myself clever enough to escape any question about that night's work. My wife's letter announced her intention of running away with her lover. My wife's trunks were packed ready for the journey. The world should be made to believe that she had carried out her intention.

"Unwillingly, under strongest protest, my brother looked on while I carried my dead wife through the shrubbery to the river, and threw her in at a spot where I knew the water was deepest. I took measures to weigh the corpse, and it would have lain there quietly till the crack of doom had no search been made. When the business was over, I left the Park, and walked all through the rest of the night. I got into Bideford next day, and took a boat, and was knocked about the coast for a week or so before I went back to the Abbey.

"No one but my brother knew of my being at the Abbey that night: no one but my brother knew of my crime. His was not a guilty knowledge. He knew nothing until the deed was done; he gave me no help in getting rid of the body; he did his uttermost to induce me to confess what I had done.

The constable who had charge of Sir Adrian, was presently ordered to take Mr. Belfield into custody; but the prisoner was treated with considerable courtesy, and accommodated with a seat while the enquiry went on. As Valentine seated himself near his brother, Adrian stretched out his hand, and the brothers clasped hands silently, amidst the silence of the court. Lady Belfield sat with her head bent and her face hidden. There was a strange conflict of feeling in her breast. Gladness and pride because her beloved had acted an honest part, apprehension at the thought of his danger, that peril which he had of his own accord returned to face.

The next witness was one who had not been called previously, a witness whom Mr. Markham had hunted down since the inquest.

This was the man whose boat Valentine had hired on the twentieth of August, and who swore to the strange manner of his fare, and the state of physical exhaustion in which he had remained for a long time.

This was the only new witness. The others only repeated the evidence given at the inquest, with such additional details as Sir Adrian's counsel or Mr. Distin could extort in cross-examination.

But there was no startling effect produced by any of these witnesses. It was felt by most people present that the drama was nearly played out.

No one doubted the truth of Valentine Belfield's confession. He was there, a voluntary witness against himself, and there was the stamp of truth upon every word he had spoken.

His wife's own hand acknowledged her guilty intention, and in the unfinished letter there was some justification for the husband's violence. He had done well to be angry—but he had gone too far in his anger. That was all. Between the justifiable anger you are not strong enough yourself to protect our interests."

"I am not a criminal lawyer, Sir Adrian; but perhaps my regard for your family may stand in the place of experience at the Old Bailey. I am not afraid to undertake your defence if you will trust me."

"I would rather trust you than any other member of your profession."

The following day was Sunday, a dismal Sabbath for Adrian, who had so rarely been absent from his place in the old parish church, and whose Sundays had been verily days of rest; days devoted to kindly visitings among the old and infirm, to serious reading and quite thought. A gloom had overshadowed all his days since his brother's crime, but Sunday had been not the less a day apart, a time of prayer and meditation, remorseful memory of the hapless dead, and intercession for the sinner.

This day he spent with his mother sitting beside him, in mournful silence, or in silent prayer, for the most part. They sat together through the dull wintry day, taking very little heed of time—only noting the passing of the hours by the church bells, sounding with a heavy monotony from the old Norman tower near at hand—the fine old square tower with its crocketted finials, rising high above old tiled gable ends, clustering on the summit of the hilly street. More distant bells came with a softer sound from a church on the other side of the river, and mingled with these, came the shrill single bell of a Nonconformist conventicle. To that mourning mother's ear, it seemed as it the air were full of bells and she thought, shudderingly, of that great bell of St. Sepulchre's which she had read of tolling with funereal stroke for the passing of a sinner's soul. The bells had done their worst by seven o'clock in the evening, when Adrian entreated his mother to share the dinner that had been brought from the hotel for him. She had ordered her carriage to come for her at ten o'clock. They sat down at the shabby little table, in the light of a paraffin lamp, and each made a pretence of eating in the hope of encouraging the other.

There was to be an enquiry before the magistrate to-morrow, an enquiry at which Adrian would appear in his new character—no longer a witness, but a prisoner, accused of being implicated in his brother's crime.

The morning came, with drizzling rain and a south-west wind, a low gray sky and a heavy mist, through which the long black ridge of the moor looked like the shoulder of a reclining giant sprawling along the level earth, and shutting out the sea. Adrian rose after a sleepless night, horribly depressed. His ignorance of his brother's movements filled him with anxiety. The unutterable anguish in his mother's face yesterday, in those long hours of silence, broken only by half mechanical speech, had agonised him. What could he do to comfort her if the worst should happen, and Valentine should be arrested and brought back to the scene of his crime? What could he do, he asked himself. And the answer meant only despair. He knew too well that the dominant feing of his mother's heart was her love for her younger son. Her grief for him would be an inconsolable grief.

The magistrate's room was crowded, as the Coroner's room had been. There were three magistrates on the bench, all of whom knew and honoured the name of Belfield, and felt for the unhappy mother who sat apart in her black raiment, with the old family lawyer by her side. Lord St. Austell and Colonel Deverill were present, and the legal element was represented by Mr. Cheyney, the sandy-whiskered gentleman from the Treasury Mr. Distin, who watched the case on behalf of Colonel Deverill, and Mr. Tompion, Q. C., whom Mr. Gresham had engaged to protect his client.

Markham, alias Melnotte, sat near Mr. Distin.

realised the worst that could befall him, and who was prepared to endure it in the full strength of his manhood.

"I am here to answer for the death of my wife," he said, gravely and quietly, standing like a rock, with his face towards the bench, and with an air of seeing no one but the magistrates who sat there. "It was I who killed her."

The clerk began to take down his evidence, which was given slowly and distinctly, with a deliberation that made the writer's task easier than usual.

"Yes, it was I who killed her. She had been a loving wife, and I had been a selfish and neglectful husband, over-secure in my confidence, forgetting that there are always scoundrels and profligates on the watch for such prey—a pretty woman with a careless husband, intent on his own pleasures. We had never quarrelled, and I had never seen occasion for jealousy, till one night in a railway carriage, I over-heard a conversation between two men, which informed me that my wife was being pursued by a notorious seducer. At first I was inclined to be incredulous, but on discovering certain facts connected with the sale of a horse which I had given to my wife in good faith, but which had practically been the gift of her admirer, I saw that this person's intentions were as vile as they could possibly be. The fact that he had been my particular friend would, I suppose, hardly make his conduct baser. The seducer is generally the husband's friend.

"I came down to Chadford without an hour's delay, meaning to save my wife, if there were yet time, but in no soft temper towards her. The first thing I heard upon arriving was that the seducer was living in the neighbourhood, in hiding. I entered my mother's house after midnight, with no worse intention than to call my wife to account for her falsehood and her folly, and to have a complete understanding with her. Such an explanation might have resulted in total severance, or in reconciliation. I had not asked myself which way it was likely to end. I was very angry; my heart and my head were both on fire. God knows I had no thought of killing her; but I desired nothing more keenly than an encounter with her lover.

"I found her after midnight, with her trunks packed ready for departure, all her preparations deliberately made. She was writing when I entered the room. She tried to keep the letter from me in her terror, but I snatched it out of her hand. This is the letter—unfinished."

The letter was handed to one of the magistrates, who read it first to himself and then aloud, amidst the breathless silence of the court.

At the far end of the room, among the spectators was a tall woman in black, who had entered immediately after Valentine, and who stood there watching and listening. She wore a small black straw bonnet, very plainly made, and a thick veil. Behind that veil, and in that bonnet, no one noticed Madge Dawley's striking beauty. She was only one figure more in the closely packed crowd a intent upon the man who stood in front of the magistrates' table, making a confession of his crime.

"We had some conversation after I had read that letter, a little dialogue which only served as a commentary on ext. She loved another man and she ha ceased to love me. She stood before me elling me this, looking me in the face and elling me that she meant to dishonor me.

"I couldn t stand this, and I lifted my malacca cane and struck her. I suppose I meant to knock her down. I don't believe I meant to kill her."

There was a pause, and a little choking sound in his dry throat, before he went on very quietly.

"Unluckily, my cane had a loaded handle. I struck her on the temple and she was the stamp of truth upon every word he had spoken.

His wife's own hand acknowledged her guilty intention, and in the unfinished letter there was some justification for the husband's violence. He had done well to be angry—but he had gone too far in his anger. That was all. Between the justifiable anger that would cast off an erring wife, and the savage fury which slew her, there was a wide gulf; but that gulf had been too easily crossed by the man who had never learnt to curb his temper or to control his evil passions. That was what most people in the magistrates' court though about Mr. Belfield, as the brothers sat quietly, side by side, like and yet unlike, but never truer in their allegiance to each other, come weal, come woe, that they were to-day.

The result of the inquiry was that Valentine Belfield was committed for trial at the next assizes, charged with the wilful murder of his wife, Helen Belfield, on the morning of August 20th, while Sir Adrian Belfield was set at liberty, the Bench of Magistrates choosing to ignore those points in his brother's confession which showed that though he was guiltless of being an accessory before the fact he was admittedly an accessory after the fact. Local influence and spotless character here bore down the weight of evidence, and there was a murmur of opprobation in the room when Sir Adrian Belfield was ordered to be released from custody. Even the fact that he had deliberately perjured himself was forgotten.

During the five weeks which elapsed before the opening of the assizes, Lady Belfield never left Exeter. She saw her son every day and spent hours with him in his imprisonment, comforted by the mere fact of being in his company, comforted still more by the softened temper which he showed in all things, His whole nature seemed to have been subdued and chastened by that long agony of silent remorse, which his strong resolute soul had struggled against in vain.

"I fancied I could forget that night, mother," he said, "blot the whole thing out, live out my life just as if no such horror had ever happened; but I did not know what the shedding of blood means. Never for one single hour of my life have I forgotten—never shall I forget, while I have a brain to remember. But I can bear the memory better now. It is not so heavy a burden."

"You have done all you could in atonement," said the mother, fondly. "It was noble of you to come back."

"Noble! I should have been the veriest cur had I hesitated, when I saw my brother's honour at stake. But perhaps I might have been that cur had it not been for a woman!"

"What woman, Valentine?"

"One who has eaten the bread of dependance in your house, mother, but as good and noble a woman as you are. I cangive her no higher praise."

And then he told his mother the story Madge Dawley s life, from his wicked wooing in the idle autumn afternoons, and her scornful repulse of his overtures, to his last experiences in the Forlorn Hope. He spared himself in no wise, confessing how dishonourable his intentions had been in the beginning; how true and steadfast she had shown herself from first to last.

"And yet she loves me, mother, as men are not often loved. She has loved me from the first. She loves me mone the less because of this cloud upon my life. She has been to this prison once a week since I was brought here. She has come all the way from London, absenting herself from those duties which she holds sacred, and she has sat with me here hand clasped in hand, for an hour or so and then has kissed me good-bye, and has gone quietly back to her work, travelling so many miles just for that one hour, and she will be true to me to the bitter end. If ever I am a free man again, Madge Dawley will be my wife.

Will it wound your pride, mother, that I should marry a daughter of the people?"

"My dearest, if she is as good a woman as you think her, I will welcome her with all my heart, I would be grateful to her, even if she were an erring woman, for the sake of her devotion to my son."

"She is spotless, mother, and as true as steel."

"Then when the glad day comes that you are free to marry, I will be proud of her."

Mr. Gresham, and the famous Tompion, Q. C., who was to conduct Valentine's defence, aided by a pair of clever juniors, had fully discussed the chances of the prisoner, and were of opinion that he would be acquitted on the capital charge. It would be a narrow escape, at best, as the concealment of the body was a damning fact. But it was hoped that the wife's letter would influence the jury, and incline them to a lenient view of the circumstances, nor could the feeling inspired by the respectability of the Belfield family be ignored. There was no doubt that Lady Belfield's personal character would have weight with a judge and jury.

Mr. Tompion was not mistaken in this view of the case. He surpassed himself in the eloquence of his defence; he melted at his own pathos; and drew floods of tears from his audience. He dwelt on the agony of the husband's feelings, stung to madness by the treason of the wife he adored; he painted the peaceful family life, the mother with her twin sons, the family circle, into which evil feeling had never entered until the seducer came there, like the serpent into Eden. He depicted the remorse of the unhappy man, who in the moment of maddened feeling had struck down the creature he idolized. How, in his horror at finding himself an involuntary assassin, he had tried to hide his deed from the light, had tried to forget what he had done. In vain, in vain. You have heard, gentlemen, that the prisoner was a changed man from that hour. He was no hardened reprobate. The pangs of conscience tortured him by night and day, and he knew not one moment of relief until he stood up boldly before his fellow-men, and voluntarily confessed his crime, inviting whatever punishment the law might inflict.

And then Mr. Tompion went on to show that in no case could the crime be more than manslaughter. The act had been altogether unpremeditated; the blow had been struck by an instrument which happened to be carried in the prisoner's hand, and to which no evil intent could attach itself. It had been the act of a single moment. The medical evidence showed that there had been but one blow, and that had been unhappily fatal. Yet it had not been necessarily fatal. Had the blow fallen upon any other part of the victim's head, it might have stunned, but it need not have killed her. There was nothing to show that the prisoner had ever contemplated her death. Had he taken his brother's advice, and at once alarmed the house, the suspicion of murder could not possibly have attached to him.

This and much more, urged Mr. Tompion in mitigation of Valentine Belfield's guilt; and the judge followed with a summing up which strongly favoured the prisoner, albeit he took care to point out the reprehensible nature of all his acts after the fatal blow, and the cruel wrong done to his dead wife's reputation and to the feelings of her kindred, in allowing her to be talked of as a runaway wife, while she was lying in her unconsecrated grave, unhonoured and unmourned. The whole course of the prisoner's conduct after his first fatal act must be considered as an aggravation of the guilt of that act, said the judge.

The result was a verdict of manslaughter. The judge pronounced sentence—two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

Lord Sackville's Indiscretion—Continental Affairs—The Sectarian Schools.

Very full details of Lord Sackville's dull folly and of the comments and agitation to which it has given rise have been cabled to London during the last two days, and the episode for the moment transcends in interest even the Parnell Commission. I have talked with a good many Englishmen in Parliamentary and official life and have found not one who does not regard the thing as an unpardonable piece of stupidity. The London press has preserved an almost absolute silence on the subject, but the Manchester "Guardian's" remark that "the letter was a blunder of the most unfortunate character, and Lord Salisbury will no doubt deem it his duty to take official notice of the indiscretion," expresses the general English feeling. Lord Salisbury has cabled to him a rebuke couched in such terse and energetic terms that his prompt resignation is taken for granted in Downing-street and that provision has already been made to retire him on a second-class pension of $6 500 yearly, to which his term of service entitles him. It may be mentioned incidentally that the fact that he is a brother of the Countess of Derby, who is the stepmother of Lord Salisbury, does not improve his relations with the Prime Minister.

Apart from the sudden reappearance of the shadow of Boulangism the only interesting thing on the Continent is the Servian politico-matrimonial squabble. About this European opinion, speaking now of all Europe save France and Russia, is curiously divided. Personal sympathy runs very generally with Nathalie. Political sympathy is with Milan. No doubt the Queen is individually in the right, and has been treated brutally by her dull, drunken gambler of a husband, but, on the other hand, Milan, disreputable libertine though he may be, represents the Austrian ascendency in Servia, and that is felt to be more desirable for European peace and public policy generally than Russian domination. What will come of the King's bold step, which is an odd parody of Henry VIII.'s trick in first creating his Archbishop and then getting from him his divorce, remains to be seen. Nathalie is going to St. Petersburg when the Czar and Czarina return from the Caucasus, and will be received there in state. Whether she will get overt assistance from Russia is another matter, but the present effect will be to increase the secret Pan Slavic agitation in Servia, and thus strengthen Austria's hold on the King. It is well known that if Milan could get money enough to live handsomely the rest of his life he would chuck up the whole business of Kingship and go to Paris, whither all his inclinations lead him. Perhaps his abdication and a setting up of his son under Austrian tutelage is the most likely outcome.

England this month will be deeply agitated by the question of the secularization of public schools. Sectarian schools now receive fully $10,000,000 annually from the Treasury. The report of the Royal Commission on Education, a body which contains, besides Cardinal Manning, a preponderant number of Church of England dignitaries and sympathizers, now proposes to levy on the taxes as well for the support of these sectarian schools up to the amount of $250 for every scholar in average attendance. The whole Nonconformist body is up in

A curious case has just been decided upon appeal in a Scottish court. A young woman brought an action of breach of promise against a young man who admitted having been engaged to her. His defence was that she objected to his smoking and finally said, "Choose between your cigar and me." He made the choice in favor of the weed, and when she sued him the judge held that by offering the alternative she was responsible for the swain's desertion, and the superior court sustained the decision.

A very stylish dress for a young lady is of plain and fancy silk. The skirt is of the plain silk; the front of the fancy goods, in very elaborately draped folds. The sides are plain from the edge of the basque to the bottom of the skirt; the back is in very full box-plaits, slightly draped. The body is plain, with vest and wide revers of the fancy material, like the apron front; the collar is plain. The sleeves are full from shoulder to elbow, and plain from the elbow to the wrist. Bands of handsome trimming are set on the neck below the collar, around the sleeves at the elbow, and fall from either side of the front from the basque point over the plain side pieces.

Bears have not so good a chance in preying on horses, as they are too slow for these swift-footed animals; but a mountain lion can easily catch a horse, says a Colorado despatch to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. An incident of this kind recently occurred in South Park, at August Lesenberg's ranch, near the head of Michigan Creek. A large lion attacked two horses and a colt of this range, killing the colt and badly wounding the mother and a two year-old. The mare and the lion waged a terrible fight, for the mother made a hard struggle to save her colt. The mare bore evidences of this almost unequal contest with the lion, for she was badly scratched and her ears were wife, while she was lying in her unconsecrated grave, unhonoured and unmourned. The whole course of the prisoner's conduct after his first fatal act must be considered as an aggravation of the guilt of that act, said the judge.

The result was a verdict of manslaughter. The judge pronounced sentence—two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

It was a heavier sentence than the sanguine had hoped for; but to Lady Belfield, whose fears had been terrible, this worst and last result of her son's wrong-doing seemed light. She clasped her hands in silent thankfulness when the sentence was pronounced.

There was another woman who stood with clasped hands, full of resignation—that woman who had promised to be his wife when his hair was white. Madge Dawley saw him move slowly away from the dock between two warders, and knew that for two weary years the law would hold him in subjection like a little child, meting out his tasks and regulating every movement of his life. She knew that his slow hours would pass in automatic labours—cleaning his cell, going out and coming in at the word of command, working with a gang of other toilers, each the image of himself; eating, drinking, kneeling to pray by line and rule, living for the most part in a death-like silence, in which the ticking of the clock or the sudden opening of a door is almost too much for the prisoner's weakened nerves.

She found a friendly sergeant at last, who told her the Dartmoor regulations, which seemed hard and cruel to her, who would have travelled from London to Devonshire every week, just for the comfort of sitting by the captive's side for an hour, in mournful silence for the most part.

Sir Adrian met her as she was leaving the court.

"I have been looking for you, Margaret," he said. "My mother would like to see you before you go back to London. May I take you to her?"

"I should like to see Lady Belfield very much. There is no train that will take me back to London this evening. I have engaged a room for the night, and shall go by an early train to-morrow."

"Then you can spend the evening with us. My mother wants to talk to you—to thank you for your devotion to my brother."

"She has no need to thank me. I have only obeyed my destiny. I could not help loving him. I loved him only the better in his sin and misery, than I loved him when he was proud and happy."

They walked together to the old gray house in which Lady Belfield was lodging, and Adrian led Madge Dawley up to the drawing-room, where his mother was sitting in an easy chair by the fire, weeping the quiet tears of resignation for the son whom she must see so seldom in those two unhappy years. She had seen him led off as a criminal, to expiate his crime among other malefactors. It was not enough that he had confessed his guilt, that he had suffered the slow tortures of remorse. He must pay the penalty. And he had looked so ill and wan in the grey winter light, and afterwards in the glare of the gas. Would he live to accomplish his penance? Would he ever come forth again into the the light of day, a free man?

Madge went over to the sorrowing mother and knelt down beside her. Lady Belfield put her arm round the girl's neck and kissed her.

"He told me all that you had done for him," she said. "I thank God that there is one other woman in the world who loves him as well as I do."

The Thrush.

The song-thrush, or mavis, is one of the best-known and best-loved of British songbirds, and with reason, as not only is it one of the best of singers, but, with the exception of its cousin, the missel-thrush, or storm-cock, as it is called in some countries, it is the first bird that by its song suggests the coming spring. No sooner has the new year begun than, given a few warm days, the thrush may be heard from its favourite post, on one of the higher branches of a tree, piping—in half-hearted manner, it is true, and as if it were almost ashamed of its presumption, but still delightfully. As a London bird the thrush is far from uncommon, being found in all the parks and in most of the larger gardens and pleasure-grounds of the inner suburbs, where houses are fewer and gardens more plentiful, this bird is almost as common as it is in the country. It is essentially a "homely" bird, fond of human society, as is proved by the fact that it will nest in gardens, often close to much-frequented paths. Unlike most birds—songsters—the thrush has a song which can be translated into words, no doubt nonsensical, but nevertheless conveying the song exactly—in fact, to quote the late Frank Buckland, the bird does sing the following words—"Knee deep, knee deep, knee deep; cherry du, cherry du, cherry du, cherry du; pretty joey, pretty joey, pretty joey."

"ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH."

"The next morning by daylight he continued his journey, not forgetting to blaze with his axe the trees to the right and left as he went along. The ground was so spongy and wet that at every step he plunged up to his knees in water, but he seemed no nearer the end of the swamp than he had been the day before. He saw several deer, a racoon, and a ground-hog, during his walk, but was unmolested by bears or wolves. Having passed through several creeks, and killed a great many snakes, he felt so weary towards the end of the second day that he determined to go home the next morning. But just as he began to think his search was fruitless, he observed that the cedars and tamaracks which had obstructed his path became less numerous, and were succeeded by bass and soft maple. The ground, also, became less moist, and he was soon ascending a rising slope, covered with ash and beech, which shaded land o the very best quality. The old man was now fully convinced that he had cleared the great swamp; and that, instead of leading to the other world, it had conducted him to a country that would yield the very best returns for cultivation. His favorable report led to the foundation of the road that we are about to cross, and to the settlement of Peterborough, which is one of the most promising new settlements in this district, and is surrounded by a splendid back country."

We were descending a very steep hill, and encountered an ox sleigh, which was crawling slowly up it in a contrary direction. Three people were seated at the bottom of the vehicle upon straw, which made a cheap substitute for buffalo-robes. Perched, as we were, upon the crown of the height, we looked completely down into the sleigh, and during the whole course of my life I never saw three uglier mortals collected into such a narrow space. The man was blear-eyed, with a hare-lip, through which protruded two dreadful yellow teeth that resembled the tusks of a boar. The woman was long-faced, high cheek-boned, red-haired and freckled all over like a toad. The boy resembled his hideous mother, with the addition of a villanous obliquity of vision which rendered him the most disgusting object in this singular trio.

As we passed them, our driver gave a knowing nod to my husband, directing, at the same time, the most quizzical glance towards the strangers, as he exclaimed, "We are in luck, sir! I think that 'ere sleigh may be called Beauty's egg-basket!"

We made ourselves very merry at the poor people's expense, and Mr. D——, with his odd stories and Yankeefied expressions, amused the tedium of our progress through the great swamp, which in summer presents for several miles one uniform bridge of rough and unequal logs, all laid loosely across huge sleepers, so that they jump up and down, when pressed by the wheels, like the keys of a piano. The rough motion and jolting occasioned by this collision is so distressing, that it never fails to entail upon the traveller sore bones and an aching head for the rest of the day. The path is so narrow over these logs that two waggons cannot pass without great difficulty, which is rendered more dangerous by the deep natural ditches on either side of the bridge, formed by broad creeks that flow out of the swamp, and often terminate in mud-holes of very ominous dimensions. The snow, however, hid from us all the ugly features of the road, and Mr. D—— steered us through in perfect safety, and landed us at the door of a little log house which crowned

We had now passed through the narrow strip of clearing which surrounded the tavern, and again entered upon the woods. It was near sunset, and we were rapidly descending a steep hill, when one of the traces that held our sleigh suddenly broke. D—— pulled up in order to repair the damage. His brother's team was close behind, and our unexpected stand-still brought the horses upon us before J. D—— could stop them. I received so violent a blow from the head of one of them, just in the back of the neck, that for a few minutes I was stunned and insensible. When I recovered, I was supported in the arms of my husband, over whose knees I was leaning, and D—— was rubbing my hands and temples with snow.

"There, Mr. Moodie, she's coming-to. I thought she was killed. I have seen a man before now killed by a blow from a horse's head in the like manner." As soon as we could, we resumed our places in the sleigh; but all enjoyment of our journey, had it been otherwise possible, was gone.

When we reached Peterborough, Moodie wished us to remain at the inn all night, as we had still eleven miles of our journey to perform, and that through a blazed forest-road, little travelled, and very much impeded by fallen trees and other obstacles; but D—— was anxious to get back as soon as possible to his own home, and he urged us very pathetically to proceed.

The moon arose during our stay at the inn, and gleamed upon the straggling frame-houses which then formed the now populous and thriving town of Peterborough We crossed the wild, rushing, beautiful Otonabee river by a rude bridge, and soon found ourselves journeying over the plains or level heights beyond the village, which were thinly wooded with picturesque groups of oak and pine, and very much resembled a gentleman's park at home.

Far below, to our right (for we were upon the Smithtown side) we heard the rushing of the river, whose rapid waters never receive curb from the iron chain of winter. Even while the rocky banks are coated with ice, and the frost king suspends from every twig and branch the most beautiful and fantastic crystals, the black waters rush foaming along, a thick steam rising continually above the rapids, as from a boiling pot. The shores vibrate and tremble beneath the force of the impetuous flood, as it whirls round cedar-crowned islands and opposing rocks, and hurries on to pour its tribute into the Rice Lake, to swell the calm, majestic grandeur of the Trent, till its waters are lost in the beautiful bay of Quinte, and finally merged in the blue ocean of Ontario.

The most renowned of our English rivers dwindle into little muddy rills when compared with the sublimity of Canadian waters. No language can adequately express the solemn grandeur of her lake and river scenery; the glorious islands that float, like visions from fairy land, upon the bosom of these azure mirrors of her cloudless skies. No dreary breadth of marshes covered with flags, hide from our gaze the expanse of heaven-tinted waters; no foul mud-banks spread their unwholesome exhalations around. The rocky shores are crowned with the cedar, the birch, the alder, and soft maple, that dip their long trees in the pure stream; and from every crevice in the limestone the harebell and Canadian rose wave their graceful blossoms.

The fiercest droughts of summer may diminish the volume and power of these romantic streams, but it never leaves their rocky channels bare, nor checks the mournful music of their dancing waves.

Through the openings in the forest, we Canadians, is the result of the same very reasonable mode of arguing. The unpeopled wastes of Canada must present a dreary aspect to the new settler that the world was to our first parents after their expulsion from the Garden of Eden; all the sin which come defile the spot, or haunt it with the association of departed evil, is concentrated in their own persons. Bad spirits cannot be supposed to linger near a place where crime has never been committed. The belief in ghosts, so prevalent in old countries, must have had its foundation in the consciousness of guilt.

After clearing the low, swampy portion of the woods, with much difficulty, and the frequent application of the axe, to cut away the fallen timber that impeded our progress, our ears were assailed by a low, roaring, rushing sound, as of the falling of waters.

"That is Herriot's Falls," said our guide. "We are within two miles of our destination."

Oh, welcome sound! But those two miles appeared more lengthy than the whole journey. Thick clouds, that threatened a snow-storm, had blotted out the stars, and we continued to grope our way through a narrow, rocky path, upon the edge of the river, in almost total darkness. I now felt the chillness of the midnight hour, and the fatigue of the long journey, with double force, and envied the servant and children, who had been sleeping ever since we left Peterborough. We now decended the steep bank, and prepared to cross the rapids.

Dark as it was, I looked with a feeling of dread upon the foaming waters as they tumbled over their bed of rocks, their white crests flashing, life-like, amid the darkness of the night.

"This is an ugly bridge over such a dangerous place," said D——, as he stood up in the sleigh and urged his tired team across the miserable, insecure log bridge, where darkness and death raged below, and one false step of his jaded horses would have plunged us into both. I must confess I drew a freer breath when the bridge was crossed, and D—— congratulated us on our safe arrival in Douro.

We now continued our journey along the left bank of the river, but when in sight of Mr. S——'s clearing, a large pine-tree, which had newly fallen across the narrow path, brought the teams to a stand-still.

The mighty trunk which had lately formed one of the stately pillars in the sylvan temple of Nature, was of too large dimensions to chop in two with axes; and after about half-an-hour's labour, which to me, poor, cold, weary wight! seemed an age, the males of the party abandoned the task in despair. To go round it was impossible; its roots were concealed in an impenetrable wall of cedar-jungle on the right-hand side of the road, and its huge branches hung over the precipitous bank of the river.

"We must try and make the horses jump over it," said D——. "We may get an upset, but there is no help for it; we must either make the experiment, or stay here all night, and I am too cold and hungry for that—so here goes." He urged his horses to leap the log: restraining their ardour for a moment as the sleigh rested on the top of the formidable barrier, but so nicely balanced, that the difference of a straw would almost have overturned the heavily-laden vehicle and its helpless inmates. We, however, cleared it in safety. He now stopped, and gave directions to his brother to follow the same plan that he had adopted; but whether the young man had less coolness, or the horses in his team were more difficult to manage, I cannot tell; the sleigh, as it hung poised upon the top of the log, was overturned with a loud crash, and all my household goods and chattels were scattered over the road.

Alas, for my crockery and stone china! scarcely one article remained unbroken.

formed by broad creeks that flow out of the swamp, and often terminate in mud-holes of very ominous dimensions. The snow, however, hid from us all the ugly features of the road, and Mr. D—— steered us through in perfect safety, and landed us at the door of a little log house which crowned the steep hill on the other side of the swamp, and which he dignified with the name of a tavern.

It was now two o'clock. We had been on the road since seven; and men, women, and children were all ready for the good dinner that Mr. D—— had promised us at this splendid house of entertainment, where we were destined to stay for two hours, to refresh ourselves and rest the horses.

"Well, Mrs. J——, what have you got for our dinner?' said our driver, after he had seen to the accommodations of his teams.

"Pritters* and pork, sir. Nothing else to be had in the woods. Thank God, we have enough of that!"

D—— shrugged up his shoulders, and looked at us.

"We've plenty of that same at home. But hunger's good sauce. Come, be spry, widow, and see about it, for I am very hungry."

I inquired for a private room for myself and the children, but there were no private rooms in the house. The apartment we occupied was like the cobbler's stall in the old song, and I was obliged to attend upon them in public.

"You have much to learn, ma am, if you are going to the woods," said Mrs. J——.

"To unlearn, you mean," said Mrs. D——. "To tell you the truth, Mrs. Moodie, ladies and gentlemen have no business in the woods. Eddication spoils man or woman for that location. So, widow (turning to our hostess), you are not tired of living alone yet?"

"No, sir; I have no wish for a second husband. I had enough of the first. I like to have my own way—to lie down mistress, and get up master."

"You don't like to be put out of your old way," returned he, with a mischievous glance.

She coloured very red; but it might be the heat of the fire over which she was frying the pork for our dinner.

I was very hungry, but I felt no appetite for the dish she was preparing for us. It proved salt, hard, and unsavoury.

D—— pronounced it very bad, and the whiskey still worse, with which he washed it down.

I asked for a cup of tea and a slice of bread. But they were out of tea, and the hop-rising had failed, and there was no bread in the house. For this disgusting meal we paid at the rate of a quarter of a dollar a-head.

I was glad when the horses were again put to, we escaped from the rank odour of the fried pork, and were once more in the fresh air.

"Well, mister; did not you grudge your money for that bad meat?' said D——, when we were once more seated in the sleigh. "But in these parts the worse the fare the higher the charge."

"I would not have cared," said I, "if I could have got a cup of tea."

"Tea! it's poor trash. I never could drink tea in my life. But I like coffee, when 'tis boiled till it is quite black. But coffee is not good without plenty of trimmings."

"What do you mean by trimmings?"

He laughed. "Good sugar, and sweet cream. Coffee is not worth drinking without trimmings."

Often in after years have I recalled the coffee trimmings, when endeavoring to drink the vile stuff which goes by the name of coffee in the houses of entertainment in the country.

graceful blossoms.

The fiercest droughts of summer may diminish the volume and power of these romantic streams, but it never leaves their rocky channels bare, nor checks the mournful music of their dancing waves.

Through the openings in the forest, we now and then caught the silver gleam of the river tumbling on in moonlight splendour, while the hoarse chiding of the wind in the lofty pines above us gave a fitting response to the melancholy cadence of the waters.

The children had fallen asleep. A deep silence pervaded the party. Night was above us with her mysterious stars. The ancient forest stretched around us on every side, and a foreboding sadness sunk upon my heart. Memory was busy with the events of many years. I retraced step by step the pilgrimage of my past life, until, arriving at this passage in the sombre history, I gazed through tears upon the singularly savage scene around me, and secretly marvelled, "What brought me here?"

"Providence, was the answer which the soul gave. "Not for your own welfare, perhaps, but for the welfare of your children, the unerring hand of the Great Father has led you here. You form a connecting link in the destinies of many. It is impossible for any human creature to live for himself alone. It may be your lot to suffer, but others will reap a benefit from your trials. Look up with confidence to Heaven, and the sun of hope will yet shed a cheering beam through the forbidding depths of this tangled wilderness."

The road now became so bad that Mr. D—— was obliged to dismount, and lead his horses through the more intricate passages. The animals themselves, weary with their long journey and heavy load, proceeded at footfall. The moon, too, had deserted us, and the only light we had to guide us through the dim arches of the forest was from the snow and the stars, which now peered down upon us, through the leafless branches of the trees, with uncommon brilliancy.

"It will be past midnight before we reach your brother's clearing" (where we expected to spend the night), said D——. "I wish, Mr. Moodie, we had followed your advice and staid at Peterborough. How fares it with you, Mrs. Moodie, and the young ones? It is growing cold."

We were now in the heart of a dark cedar swamp, and my mind was haunted with visions of wolves and bears; but beyond the long, wild howl of a solitary wolf, no other sound awoke the sepulchral silence of that dismal-looking wood.

"What a gloomy spot!" said I to my husband. "In the old country, superstition would people it with ghosts."

"Ghosts! There are no ghosts in Canada!" said Mr. D——. "The country is too new for ghosts. No Canadian is afeard of ghosts. It is only in old countries, like your'n, that are full of sin and wickedness, hat people believe in such nonsense. No human habitation has ever been erected in this wood through which you are passing. Until a very few years ago, few white persons had ever passed through it; and the Red Man would not pitch his tent in such a place as this. Now, ghosts, as I understand the word, are the spirits of bad men, that are not allowed by Providence to rest in their graves, but, for a punishment, are made to haunt the spots where their worst deeds are committed. I don t believe in all this; but, supposing it to be true, bad men must have died here before their spirits could haunt the place. Now, it is more than probable that no person ever ended his days in this forest, so that it would be folly to think of seeing his ghost."

This theory of Mr. D—— s had the merit of originality, and it is not improbable that the utter disbelief in supernatural appearances which is common to most native-born or the horses in his team were more difficult to manage, I cannot tell; the sleigh, as it hung poised upon the top of the log, was overturned with a loud crash, and all my household goods and chattels were scattered over the road.

Alas, for my crockery and stone china! scarcely one article remained unbroken.

"Never fret about the china," said Mr. Moodie; "thank God, the man and the horses are uninjuried."

I should have felt more thankful had the crocks been spared too; for, like most of my sex, I had a tender regard for china, and I knew that no fresh supply could be obtained in this part of the world. Leaving his brother to collect the scattered fragments, D—— proceeded on his journey. We left the road, and were winding our way over a steep hill, covered with heaps of brush and fallen timber, and as we reached the top, a light gleamed cheerily from the windows of a log house, and the next moment we were at my brother-in-law's door.

My brother-in-law and his family had retired to rest, but they instantly rose to receive the way worn travellers; and I never enjoyed more heartily a warm welcome after a long day of intense fatigue, than I did that night of my first sojourn in the backwoods.

The Otonabee.

Dark, rushing, foaming river!
I love the solemn sound
That shakes thy shores around,
And hoarsely murmurs, ever,
As thy waters onward bound,
Like a rash, unbridled steed
Flying madly on its course;
That shakes with thundering force
The vale and trembling mead.
So thy billows downward sweep,
Nor rock nor tree can stay
Their fierce, impetuous way;
Now in eddies whirling deep,
Now in rapids white with spray.

I love thee, lonely river!
Thy hollow restless roar,
Thy cedar-girded† shore;
The rocky isles that sever
The waves that round them pour.
Katchawanook‡ basks in light,
But thy currents woo the shade
By thy lofty pine-trees made,
That cast gloom like night,
Ere day's last glories fade.

Thy solitary voice
The same bold anthem sung
When Nature's frame was young,
No longer shall rejoice
The woods where erst it rung.

Lament, lament, wild river!
A hand is on thy mane§
That will bind thee in a chain
No force of thine can sever.
Thy furious headlong tide,
In murmurs soft and low,
Is destined yet to glide
To meet the lake below;
And many a bark shall ride
Securely on thy breast,
To waft across the main
Rich stores of golden grain
From the valleys of the West.

†The banks of the river have since been denuded of trees. The rocks that formed the falls and rapids blasted out. It is tame enough now.

‡The Indian name for one of the many expansions of this beautiful river.

§Some idea of the rapidity of this river may be formed from the fact that heavy rafts of timber are floated down from Herriot's Falls, a distance of nine miles from Peterborough, in less than an hour. The shores are bold and rocky, and abound in beautiful and picturesque views.

The Fate of an Inspiration.

A pensive maid sat reading. "What genius rare!" she sighed.
"O, would I were a poet!" she rapturously cried.
"I feel such inspiration! Oh, what a blissful doubt—Perhaps I am poet, and never found it out!"

"I think I'll write a sonnet." So sat her down to write,
Somehow the fit ideas all took themselves to flight;
Somehow she really couldn't find anything to say,
Although she toiled and struggled through half a summer's day.

At last she cried, bewildered o'er various themes sublime,
"I know I could write sonnets, if they didn't have to rhyme!"
She wept, this embryo poet, then said, as teardrops fell,
"I'll look in my receipt-book, for maybe that will tell."

And there she found

"A RECEIPT FOR A RHYME."

"Take a trifle of poetry, a small pinch of prose,
And a handful of nonsense, as every one knows;
Then put to simmer, and boil them in time,—
And when it is finished you'll have a good Rhyme."

The damsel was delighted, here was a perfect guide;
Now she would write her sonnet; she took her pen and tried.
She tried, but strange to mention that poem wouldn't be,— Before, she had ideas, but minus rhymes was she;

Now she could rhyme superbly, but all ideas had fled;
So, useless was her knowledge. "Blank verse might do," she said.
Then with new hope she tried it, but this result was worse,—
Blank brains and blanker paper, but not one small blank verse.

"Perhaps," she mused, "in poetry, the same as making cake,
You have to "use your judgment,"—so I'll my judgment take;
I've mixed the other items, and now I shall succeed;
I'll write a lovely poem." The silent minutes speed,

The watchful clock keeps ticking, the verses must be done;
She eyes a spotless paper, with not a line—not one!
The mocking clock ticks gaily, the saucy minutes fly,—
Oh! can such aspiration, such high ambition die?

At last a tearful maiden uplifts her pensive head:
"I've added all my judgment—it's freezing cold," she said.
"But it is all that's needed; it leads me to infer
That I am not a poet; but oh, I wish I were!"

Mr. Edison intends to utilise the pond of water which now separates his laboratory from his new phonograph factory. He will build a small ferry-boat to be run by electricity, and it will be run back and forth from the laboratory to the factory every half hour.

An Englishman has invented an electric gun. There is a small storage battery fixed in the stock, from which a current strong enough to explode the cartridge is communicated. It is said that one charging of the cell will explode five thousand cartridges.

A lady who was one of a party of tourists making the ascent of Pike's Peak, last week, was struck by lightning while standing at the door of the signal service station on the very top of the mountain. This is the first instance known in the State of an electrical disturbance occurring above the clouds.

In France a very practical use of photography has recently been made. Several persons were imprisoned by the caving in of a wall. A hole was bored, and down this a tube with a camera was slid. The photograph showed the faces of some of the dead men, and demonstrated the uselessness of efforts at rescue.

A new bullet proposed for the English army is of an unusually small calibre, and is encased in an outer sheet of nickel, which increases its power of penetration. It is used with a rifle of greater thickness of barrel, in which a heavier charge than usual can be fired. Several hundreds of the rifles have been made for experimental use.

A swiss inventor has perfected a method of making artificial boards and is advocating their use in building. They are made of a mixture of plaster of paris and reeds pressed into shape by hydraulic presses. The material has the advantage of incombustibility and lightness and will resist the warping action of atmospheric charges.

In Carlisle, Eng., tall factory chimneys are being utilised as sewer ventilators with good results, twenty-nine now being used. The velocity of the rising air has been measured by Surveyor Mekie, and it is found to be 1,202 feet a minute in ordinary weather. The owners of the factories make no objection to this use of their chimneys, and the practice seems to meet with general approval.

An endless railway train, consisting of 400 platform cars, is to be one of the attractions at the Paris Exhibition. The line will be sunk so that the platforms will be on a level with the surface, and the train will run slowly enough to permit most people to step on and off while it is in motion; but for the accommodation of elderly people a stop of fifteen seconds every minute will be made. The motive power will be electricity.

The fitting up of coast defense guns with devices for finding positions is now being agitated in England. The cost is estimated to be about $250 a gun. By means of this invention, an officer located in any prominent position is able by electrical wires to strike a ship which may be invisible from the battery itself. Major Watkin's "position finder" has been adopted by the British Government, and he has received an award of $125,000 for the invention, and is also to be paid a royalty of $5,000 a year for the next ten years.

Strained Relations.

LONDON, Oct. 27.—The relations between the German and English courts have latterly become something more than strained, and both the Emperor and Prince Bismarck have become furious against this country, which will doubtless before long have excellent reasons for deploring the blundering fatuities of our royalties in their dealings with the Kaiser. It will be a surprise if the Emperor's visit to Rome does not lead to a coldness between this country and Italy. Emperor William does not disguise his hostility to England and particularly towards his English relations, and he did not respond with any cordiality to the Austrian Emperor's offer to bring about a reconciliation between him and the Prince of Wales.

THE ITALIAN RECEPTION.

The cordial reception given the Emperor by the Italians could hardly be taken as a personal compliment to himself, as they knew nothing about him. It was a political demonstration against France and in favour of the Triple alliance, which is designed to keep France in order.

THE EMPEROR'S GIFTS.

The Emperor's tour in Austria and Italy will cost not less than $200,000. The amount which he has given away to the servants of the sovereigns whom he visits is something fabulous, and his presents of various kinds cost a frightful sum. The Emperor took with him from Berlin 80 diamond rings, 150 silver stars, 50 scarf pins, all richly jewelled; 30 diamond bracelets, six splendid presentation swords, 30 large photographs of himself with the Empress and their children, all in gold frames; 30 gold watches with chains, 100 cigar cases with the Imperial arms and monogram in gold, and 30 stars in diamonds of the order of the Black and Red Eagle.

An Artist's Ready Reply.

Even a severe criticism may be disarmed of its severity by a happy answer that changes its meaning, and it is no less fortunate to be able to turn a good natured one. Sir John Watson Gordon, who ultimately became president of the Royal Scottish Academy, used to tell this story of Lord Palmerston:

"I had exhibited for several years, but without any particular success. One year, however, Lord Palmerston took a sudden fancy to my picture called 'Summer in the Lowlands,' and bought it at a high price. His lordship at the same time made inquiries after the artist and invited me to call upon him. I waited upon him accordingly. He complimented me upon the picture, but said there was one thing about it he could not understand.

"What is that, my lord?" I asked.

"That there should be such long grass in a field where there are so many sheep," said his lordship promptly and with a merry twinkle of the eye. It was a decided hit, and having bought the picture and paid for it he was entitled to his joke. "How do you account for it?" he went on, smiling, and looking first at the picture and then at me.

"Those sheep, my lord," I replied, "were only turned into that field the night before I finished the picture."

"His lordship laughed heartily and said 'Bravo!' at my reply and gave me a commission for two more pictures, and I have cashed since then some very notable checks of his, dear, old boy!"

A new car-brake of great promise has been invented by Mr. Widdifield, of Uxbridge, which, at recent tests on the Lehigh Valley railroad, stopped the train on each occasion in apparently as short a distance as it was safe to stop it. The invention consists of a composite sleeve cast on to the car-axle upon which two friction pulleys, thrown into action by an impulse of electricity, wind a chain gear which applies the brake. The electricity may be stored in cells or supplied from a dynamo on the engine and carried by an insulated cable along the train. It is used only to give an impulse, the momentum of the train supplying the power that works the brake. The first cost and running expenses, it is claimed, are much less than of the air brakes now in use.

There would seem to be room for some discipline in Kingston penitentiary. A convict escaped from there the other week in a way which argued censurable carelessness on somebody's part. The story goes that a guard allowed him to go to a shed, professedly for the purpose of shaving, and that he then took the opportunity to escape Surely it is an unusual degree of conideration for the prisoners to allow them the use of dangerous things like razors in that way. If they must shave there surely is or ought to be an official whose duty it is to act the barber. No wonder that judge and jury, before whom the re-arrested convict was brought, were surprised, and that the former ordered a report on the case to be sent to the Warden of the penitentiary, and to the Minister of Justice.

One of the last, if not indeed the very last link connecting the present generation of Scotch people with that in which Robert Burns lived, was recently broken by the death of a Mrs. Gilchrist, of Edinburgh, at the age of ninety-eight. Her maiden name was Martha Brown and she was a native of Kilmarnock. She had a distinct recollection of a sight she once had of the great poet. She was between four and five years old at the time, and happened to accompany her mother to the house of a relative who lived on Nelson street, Kilmarnock. Burns was visiting some friends a few doors off, and when he left every body crowded out to see him,—little Martha Brown among the rest. He wore a Tam O'Shanter bonnet and looked like a well-to-do farmer, and Martha, though a child, was impressed by his tall and sturdy form, his swarthy complexion, and kindly expression. He did not exchange greetings with anyone, but proceeded down the street, followed by the respectful gaze of the crowd. Mrs. Gilchrst had also many interesting reminiscences of some of Burns' noted contemporaries, among others of some of the clergymen immortalized in "The Two Herds" and "The Holy Fair."

The first session of the fiftieth Congress of the United States closed last Saturday. The session, thanks mainly to the fisheries, tariff and retaliation discussions, was the longest on record, having lasted no less than 321 days, or within six weeks of a whole year, Sundays being included in the enumeration of days. No wonder that Congressmen have to be paid. If such sessions are maintained they will want good substantial incomes to idemnify them not only for their services to the country but for injury to their businesses. Either that, or the standing of representatives and senators will seriously fall off.

There is an old custom still widely prevalent in Brittany that immediately after the priest has wedded a couple the bridegroom slaps the bride in the face saying, "This is how you will fare if you make me angry;" and then kissing her say, "And this is how you will fare if you treat me well." Not long ago a young Breton married a German girl, and after the ceremony gave her the time-honored slap. She didn't understand it at all, and returned the stroke with interest, saying. "Look here, I don't approve of such behavior." Thereupon the husband preceeded with the second part of the ceremony with such ferver that the angry bride was entirely satisfied.

To indulge in kissing without due warrant from the kisser may be innocent enough as an amusement, or it may not; but some London (England) magistrates are bent upon making it an expensive one. A lawyer's clerk was recently fined £5 for kissing a waitress against her will. He was perhaps one of those young men who labour under the delusion that almost every young woman, and especially every young woman who earns wages, needs only to be asked and she will bestow the honey of her lips upon anything man-shaped if so be that it is not positively grotesque. We have them in Toronto here:—Mashers, lady-killers, who ogle the girls in the restaurants, and evidently conceive of themselves as perfectly irresistible. It is a pity some of those fine buck could not be fined on the accusation of some of these girls, for annoying behaviour.

The recent meeting of the world's conference of Young Men's Christian Associations in Stockholm had the largest number of delegates ever present at any conference of the kind. The progress of the Y. M. C. A. movement is one of the most remarkable characteristics of the present age. Thousands of Associations are being formed every year. The increase in Europe alone during the last four years has been 40 per cent. and in other quarters the progress has been not less remarkable. Mr. George Williams, of London, who is regarded as the father of Young Men's Christian Association work was present at the meeting in Stockholm and delivered an address. It must have been an occasion of special gratification and thankfulness to him that he had been spared to see the enterprise assume such large and influential dimensions. It is to be hoped that the work will go on with ever increasing efficiency and it will be as well to remember that the young women need almost as much attention as the young men, and that little effort has been put forth for their comfort and improvement. Nobody would say that too much had been done for the one sex, but surely in that case too little has been done for the other. There are, it may be conceded, peculiar difficulties connected with the organization and working of young women's Guilds, but not of such a kind that zeal, energy and Christian wisdom could not successfully overcome.

How Heelers Work.

The atmosphere has got to be very frigid when Collingwood Schrieber gets left. A few days ago—during his late tour of inspection—Mr. Schrieber had occasion to go over one of the branch lines of the Intercolonial in Nova Scotia. Everything appeared to be moving along swimmingly. The section men were working like beavers, the perspiration rolling from every pore, and everybody appeared to be earning his salary. Mr. Schrieber smiled patronizingly, professed to be greatly pleased, and moved along. Three miles from where the section gang were labouring so hard, he ordered his train to be stopped, and then to be backed down two miles. This was done, and then Mr. S. got out and walked the remainder of the distance. When he reached the spot where the men had been perspiring a few minutes before, there was not the slightest sign of life to be seen—everything was as still as the grave. The section foreman was sent for and his time book examined, when it was found that full time had been given all the men for the day. Not being able to give satisfactory answers, the track-master was summoned. His explanations were also so unsatisfactory that Mr. Schrieber ordered the dismissal of the whole batch of men.

Sir Richard Cartwright, in addressing his constituents, is following out a practice adopted by many of England's great men. Gladstone addresses his constituents during recess; Lord Hartington, Lord Randolph Churchill, Sir Wm. Harcourt, Sir Geo. We have in our midst a GREAT MAN but he is unlike the others in this respect—he waits till his leader speaks before he gives expression to his views on leading matters. It would be interesting to hear him on the questions of the day. Uriah, stand up.

The question of unrestricted reciprocity has now become, by the decision of the representatives of the Liberal party in the House of Commons of Canada, a cardinal point in the platform of the party. And I may add that in the whole course of my experience, I have never known a question of anything like that importance so promptly and unanimously received, with as few exceptions indeed, by the members of any political party, as the question of unrestricted reciprocity, or, fuit and free trade with the United States. (Cheers.) Moreover, in this we have the advantage and happiness of knowing that we enjoy the support of a very considerable portion of those who thought differently from us on political subjects.—Sir Richard Cartwright, at Ingersol.

The Horses of the County.

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS

Dear Sir,—In your issue of 19th Oct., I noticed an article treating on the above named subject, from one who subscribes himself "A Stock Lover," in which he gives farmers and breeders credit for showing a much greater amount of interest and enterprise in the matter of horse breeding than in former years, but intimates that the enterprise is yet in its infancy, to a great degree; that there is yet much to learn, both in theory and practice, to make it the success financially, or otherwise, that it is possible to accomplish.

He also thinks breeders are committing grave errors by trying to concentrate too many qualities in one aminal, viz., by seemingly trying to produce a horse that will take the place of a road, carriage, general purpose, or a draught horse, which certainly cannot be accomplished with satisfaction either to breeder or purchaser. I heartily subscribe to "Stock Lover's" views thus far. One good omen for horse breeding is the gradual discarding for the penny wise and pound foolish system, formerly advocated by some and practiced by many, of using the cheapest sires; that, being considered a sufficent recommendation as to their fitness. Many of our best farmers (and the number are yearly increasing) are now making praiseworthy efforts to use the best sires available, regardless (to a reasonable degree) of cost; and the much improved quality of the young colts and horses that are growing up in this, and the adjoining counties, speak too plainly to be misunderstood the wisdom of such a policy. But there is another important feature connected with this question (second only to that just maned) and one which is seemingly lost sight of by far too many farmers; and that is the desirability, I might say necessity (if we would have uniform and satisfactory results) of having a good dam as well as sire, as much depends on the qualities of the dam. Many, who consider themselves first-class farmers, seem to look upon it as too great a sacrifice to keep their best young mares for breeding purposes, but think it a better policy to place them in the market, as they will command a higher price; and take some old broken down and infirm mares, which may have been of some value in their younger days, but through many years of hard work and probably much ill treatment have become comparatively worthless, yet are considered good subjects for breeding purposes. To such a course of management, much, yes a large percentage, of the inferior horses of the counties may be traced. Even though sires of superior qualities and of the finest strains of breeding be used with such dams, disappointment, to a greater or less extent, is the almost inevitable result. If we would have pernament success in breeding horses for the general market, and home use as well, we must first obtain good sized, well formed healthy mares, as free as possible from constitutional blemishes or ailments; then use our best judgment in the selection of a first-class, high bred stallion to cross with them, and we may reasonably expect the result to be highly satisfactory and disappointments exceptionably few.

I fully endorse "Stock Lover's" views, as being sound on the proper method of getting road and carriage horses, viz., by using the thoroughbred race horse for sire. Unquestionably, he is the best adapted, with a proper cross, to produce those classes of horses; being compact in form, having a strong and robust constitution, possessed with a wonderful amount of endurance, good feet, and legs with tendons like steel, a naturally fine and lofty carriage, and with activity and energy unbounded. These and other superior qualities, possessed compact in form, with sufficent energy and good style and action, and crossing them with a good heavy draught sire, we will, in most cases, obtain a very desirable farm or general purpose horse, weighing from 1100 to 1300 lbs, which I consider large enough for that class; when beyond that line they are bordering on the heavy draught. "Stock Lover" claims that the produce of the Punch and Percherons can not only draw a moderate load, but will carry a person with such rapidity "that he need not fear dying of age before he arrives at the market." Intimating, I would infer, that the Clydesdale and Shire were quite too slow. I will just say, if I wished to raise a quick motion horse I should not be inclined to employ a Percheron sire in preference to a Clydesdale, for as far as my observation goes the get of the Clydesdale are far superior as to style, action and ambition, to that of the Percheron, and for other reasons as well. I am fully pursuaded that the Clydesdale is really the king of draught horses.

Hoping I have not wearied your patience too far or trespassed too much on your valuable space. I remain, respectfully,

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

Dear Sir,—I was much pleased with your issue last week. Since assuming control of THE EXPRESS you have done good service in exposing trickery and jobbery. You have shown that you are not subservient to this one and that one simply because they may have printing or advertising to do. Continue in the line you have adopted; success will be yours.

I was glad you gave full particulars regarding the John-st sewer. There was evidently a plot to do the town out of $90, and you struck the niggers finely. I notice that you let Bartlett down very easily though. He endeavors to throw the blame for the work not being done before this on the council, in their putting the matter off. If, as he says, the petition was ready signed for weeks why did he not press the matter. Instead, he was off at different places shooting. If it was so important that the work be done early, that money might be saved the town, why did he not show his interest in the place by remaining here and pushing it through. I don't know what he made at the matches, but this is evident that Davis would not have made an effort to secure the commission (as from what you give it was not until quite lately that he wrote to undermine Bartlett) so Bartlett would have been ahead $90. The town would have had to pay the $90 commission, but according to the story of Bartlett and the opinion of the contractors, a considerable sum would have been saved the town, much more we are led to believe than $90.

As to Lapum I hope the citizens are getting sufficient of him. They rejected a man with some honor when they voted Mr Rose out. The inspector has some faults, like us all, but he is a much more sterling man than the present deputy-reeve.

Coun Davis has always been a conundrum to the majority of the people. How he could manage to live the way he does and spend so much time on the streets they could not understand. This transaction explains it somewhat. He has been a good man for the centre ward this summer, there's no doubt. But at the expense of the others. He has treated his fellow-councilman, Mr. Lane, shamefully. Mr Lane is an old man, but not too old to see through Mr Davis, and has brought down upon his hoary head the displeasure of Davis because he exposes his little tricks.

One thing you omitted to mention in connection with the public meeting, and that was the readiness that coun Madden jumped up to move his motion after the one entertaining Davis' proposition had been carried by so large a majority, notwithstanding the fact that the chairman had repeatedly asked the opinion of the councillors on the matter. He evidently thought by so doing he was going to gain popularity. He, it was, I understand, that got what is called the informal meeting up, and when Davis asked that his ticket to Milwaukee be made good, as the one he had was of no use if he stopped over, sat quietly by and said nothing, instead of, as a ticket agent, asking to see the non-usable ticket.

The fact of the matter is that Madden, and other Tories are smarting under the present policy of the government, and would be only too glad to have a something start up that would go to show that the country was not depressed. Why don't they form a company themselves and start a factory of some kind. Let Madden, Wilson, Carscallen, Lapum, Davis, etc, etc, not forgetting Mr Douglas, Mr Davis' friend, who the chairman announced was quite anxious that something be done for the place, put their heads together and start a tall chimney. I might suggest that tanneries pay at different points, tofore. Owing to the change in the time table, the N. T. & Q. are compelled to leave long before the arrival of the express from the west in order to get back again and connect with the afternoon express from the east. This deprives the people of the villages along that road of their midday mail. We trust that Mr. Hickson will see his way clear to give a better service east of Toronto and that the necessary changes will be made at once.

—Now that the iniquity, the loss, the vexation and confusion to Manitoba and the whole Dominion of the Canadian Pacific are so thoroughly demonstrated to all the people, it may be as well to remember that our own dear Uriah, who mis-represents Lennox, was one of those who voted favorable to the continuance of that grinding monopoly, and confidence in the government responsible for it, during the session of the House of Commons in 1886. The Reformers then sought to adopt a resolution condemning that blight on the success of the North-west and Uriah Wilson voted with the balance of Sir John's faithful in favor of keeping it on. So long as Lennox and other counties send men to Ottawa willing to endorse "the old man," no matter how iniquitous and injurious his acts, so long will the country suffer shame and loss, because of reckless and corrupt administration. The C. P. R. now dares to put the people and the interests of Manitoba at defiance because it knows Sir John is at its back, willing to defend it, and Sir John dare put the best interests of Canada at defiance because he knows a majority of the present parliament are at his back willing to wade into any mud after him. Such a subservient Tory following is an expensive luxury to Canada.

—We have received from the London Advertiser a copy of their quarter-century number, a handsomely gottenup sheet, printed from new type on a web printing machine. It is profusely illustrated with cuts of the Camerons, the buildings of the city and employes of the establishment. Among the latter we notice Messrs Arch Bremner and Tom Bland, who, with the writer, were years ago on the Free Press. Both of these gentlemen might have been interviewed to advantage in connection with the life of printing in the city of the west. They could have told something about the a thousand and two-thirds in orders; working all night in the composing room, then going down stairs and folding until after break o' day. Wonderful have been the changes in a few years. The Tiser has for twenty-five years done yeoman service in the cause of morality and good government. It is a staunch Liberal journal. Long may it continue in its excellent work.

—The Northwest Legislature which opened at Regina last week is made up of a number of Ontario men. Among the number is Mr J. F. Betts, of Prince Albert, known to a considerable extent in this district. He is a son of our former townsman, Rev. L. A. Betts, of Brockville, and went to Prince Albert section in 1879. He is a merchant and a J. P. of Prince Albert, and chairman of the public school board. Is against the permit system, and favors the licencing of beer. He is a conservative. Dr Wilson, formerly of Picton, Ont, is also a member, and has been elected the first speaker of the new chamber.

strong and robust constitution, possessed with a wonderful amount of endurance, good feet, and legs with tendons like steel, a naturally fine and lofty carriage, and with activity and energy unbounded. These and other superior qualities, possessed by the thoroughbred to a far greater degree than perhaps any horse, is destined, at no very distant day, to make him a universal favorite (even in these counties) as a sire of the best road and carriage horses. Again as the producer of saddle horses, an animal, which is rapidly growing in favor and popularity with the public, more especially in large towns and cities, the supply of which (for good ones) is not nearly equal to the demand at present; with that demand even at fancy prices constantly increasing, prices averaging far higher than is obtained for road or carriage horses. I say as the producer of this very important class of horses, no other sire can rival the thoroughbred race horse. And why? Because high breeding is an indispensible quality of the saddle horse. A number one saddle horse, that is less than one half of thoroughbred blood, is an extremely rare exception. The get of the thoroughbreds are naturally saddle horses, and as a consequence usually find purchasers at fancy prices, as soon as they arrive at maturity and even sooner. Need we wonder, then, at the growing popularity of the thoroughbred sire with the breeders of saddle, carriage and roadster horses? I think not. I do not feel altogether like quarrelling with 'Stock Lover" for naming Way Cry as a good type of the thoroughbred sire. And judging from the great and increasing demand for his colts for the past two years, in this section, and at prices ranging far above that of other breeds of horses, I readily conclude he is a sire worthy the patronage of the best farmers and breeders in this or any locality, and one whose loss would be deeply deplored should he be removed.

But I do not think it advisable for farmers to confine themselves exclusively to raising the clases of horses above named, nor to any one class, no more than I would advise the raising of one kind of grain on the farm, to the exclusion of all others.

There is the farm or general purpose horse and also the draught horse; each useful in its proper place, and a good demand for each in the market at remuneration prices, and consequently profitable to raise. And they also have an advantage over the higher grades, insomuch that a small pimple or blemish of any kind does not effect their marketable value to the same extent. Now I feel just a little inclined to take exception to "Stock Lover's" views with reference to these classes of horses, for it appears to me he is getting things considerably mixed, I cannot understand on what ground he places the Percheron and Suffolk Punch in a distinctly different class from the Clydesdale and Shire. I never before heard of them being so classified, although distinctly different breeds, as well as different in form and color, yet they are all invariably classed as heavy draught; and there are probably as many heavy specimens to be found in the families of Percherons and Punches, as there are in the Clydesdales and shires, and I do not think it would be difficult to prove as many good traits, such as hardness, ambition, style, activity and general soundness, predominating in the latter families named, as in the former. "Stock Lover," after classing Percherons and Suffolk Punches as as farm horses, names Young Romulus a good specimen. Now it so happens that Young Romulus is neither a Punch nor a Percheron. He is a half-breed, sired by a Percheron. There is vast difference between him and a pure bred. I am fully convinced that by a proper selection of our common bred mares, not over large, but Why don't they form a company themselves and start a factory of some kind. Let Madden, Wilson, Carscallen, Lapum, Davis, etc, etc, not forgetting Mr Douglas, Mr Davis' friend, who the chairman announced was quite anxious that something be done for the place, put their heads together and start a tall chimney. I might suggest that tanneries pay at different points, and there is a very fair building on Water-st, formerly used for this purpose. No doubt it could be had quite reasonable and Mr Madden knows something about it I fancy. Then there is the brush factory—a concern which Mr Stevenson says paid very well last year; they might take hold of it. If the country is as prosperous as Uriah Wilson would have us believe they should have no difficulty in securing funds enough to start it. But no, these men do not care to run the risk. Like Carscallen they would rather bring in the cheapest coffin, even to the injury of a large manufacturer, providing they could pocket a little by the transaction.

Wilton.

Harry, eldest son of James Wallace, died Saturday afternoon at 5 o'clock. He had been ill with neuralgia and had partially recovered, but caught more cold, which settled on his lungs. A doctor was sent for, but no relief could be given him. The funeral from the Presbyterian Church on Monday was largely attended by sympathizing friends and relatives. Kind friends arranged flowers about the altar, and the casket was covered with floral gifts. The deceased was 16 years old, and it may be truthfully said, that Wilton has lost one of its best boys.

The repairs to the Methodist church, at this place, having been finished, the church will be re-opened on Sunday next, 11th inst. Rev. J. J. Leach, Ph. D., of Newburgh, will preach at 10.30 a. m., and Rev. F. B. Stratton, of Tamworth, chairman of the district, at 2 30 p. m, Collection at each service in aid of the repair fund. Hallowe'en night passed very lively in this locality. It is said the fairies were around busybodying themselves with wagons and buggies. One lumber wagon was taken apart and strung along the fence and the tongue suspended on the top of a tree. The wheels of a spring wagon were changed about. The owner without noticing the change, was on his way to town when one of the neighbors asked him. "what is wrong with your wagon Mr. R." It was then the man noticed the "disorderly" state of his wagon. The good neighbor then helped him to place things to rights once more. A buggy in the neighborhood was dealt with in the same manner, but happily the owner noticed it in time. A cow bell was taken from the cow and rattled at a neighbor's door. The good man of the house had to get up and out in his shirt tail after the fairies but he could not see them. The good lady of a house heard some noise around the place. Thinking some body was helping themselves to the butter in the cellar she got up and out. She could not see anybody, but it is said that the busybodies could see her. They made a raid on the school house, piled the seats on top of one another and set the desk and the chair on the top of the pile, and the broom to cap all. The flowers were carefully taken from the window and set in a circle on the middle of the floor. The teacher is very thankful to the busybodies for their tender care of the flowers.

HOUSEHOLD.

A Plea for Father.

It is not because wives and children are cold and cruel, nor yet because they are selfish, but only because of thoughtlessness or wrong training, that father occupies the unenviable position in his own home that is characteristic of the majority of households to-day. Whether it is in the family of the millionaire or in that of the man who ekes out an existence on the miserable pittance of one dollar a day, the position he occupies in his own home is the same—simply the supporter of the family, the one on whom depends the easy running of the domestic machinery, and whose personal feelings receive very little consideration.

Of course, there are many exceptions to this rule—families where the very name of "father" seems hallowed, and where his tastes and desires must be considered above all others; but in many more families, an entirely different state of affairs exists. It is a fact beyond dispute that a man's family must look to him for support, comforts and pleasures, and it is right that this should be so. But it also right that reason should be allowed to judge how far this dependence should go. I have known some families in which the position of the head of the house seemed a most unenviable one, where he appeared to be regarded merely as a money-getting, want-supplying machine, and where it was necessary for him to give so much time and thought to others, to strive to the utmost limit of his powers to gratify desires and supply requirements as to exclude all thought of self and leave no time for enjoyment or rest.

That this is true, is caused much by habit and wrong instruction. Children are taught from early infancy to look upon "father" as the gratifier of all wishes and desires, and come to believe that it is in his power to promote the fruition of every wish, and grant every request; and as they grow this habit naturally grows with them and stays only to be transferred from father to husband, when exchanging one protector for the other, and is, in turn, transmitted to children. Thus, the evil of misunderstanding the rightful position of the father in his household grows and brings other evils in its train. Father's occupation of "running" things, keeping everything "moving," has been his so long, his position is so thoroughly established and is so firmly believed in, that seldom is he thought of as one deserving pity or extra care and attention, because of the burdens put upon him and which are so uncomplainingly borne; and yet the life the average "head of the family" lives is truly not an enviable one. To feel that all family and business cares, the comfort and happiness of dependent loved ones must rest on one's shoulders, however tired or bent they may be, and to feel that nothing short of genuine helplessness must hinder one in his labor when so much is depending upon him, is certainly depressing to the highest spirits. To those on whom no responsibility rests, life goes so smoothly on, so smoothly as to sometimes savor of the monotonous, that we fall naturally and unconsciously into accepting and finally forget that there is back of it all a something that keeps things moving just so, and not until that something gives out, stops—to us suddenly, yet as it must perforce do in time—do we realize the frail support we have been resting on in seeming security for so long.

Surely one who labors so constantly and so well, enduring disappointments and misfortunes for those depending on him, those so fondly dear to him, deserves a little kindness and thoughtfulness, a little tender attention at their hands, and more than all these, does he deserve patience and respect. After being out in the world working to dissolving sugar in the proportion of three pounds of sugar to one pint of water. Many persons prefer the flavor of syrup made of Orleans sugar to that made of the white.

Rice griddle cakes are very delicious. The rice is cooked until perfectly soft, drained dry, mashed with a spoon until the grains are well broken up. For each cupful of rice take two eggs, one pint of milk, one heaping teaspoonful of powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt, and flour enough to make a thin batter.

For hominy cakes take two cupfuls of cooked hominy and crush it with a potato masher until it is a smooth mass. Add one level teaspoonful of salt, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and one cupful of flour. Stir together; then add by degrees one quart of milk, and lastly three well-beaten eggs. Bake in thin cakes.

Very delicate and delicious cakes are made by allowing two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one-half teaspoonful of salt to one quart of milk, and sufficient corn meal, mixing all into a smooth, thin batter; no eggs or butter are used for these. The cakes bake quickly to a rich deep brown, and are extremely tender and light.

A very delicious, sweet pancake is made by taking one pint of sweet milk, four eggs, two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one teaspoonful of baking powder, and flour enough to make a moderately thin batter. Beat the eggs whites and yolks separately, until well frothed, stir the butter, sugar and one cupful of flour, into which the baking powder has been mixed, into the yolks, then add the milk. If needed, add more flour. Bake in small cakes, butter each one as it comes from the fire, place four in a pile, with very thin layers of any kind of sweet jelly between, and powdered sugar over the top. They should be baked very thin and four served to each person.

Economical Receipts.

HAM TOAST.—Mix pounded cold ham with beaten egg, season with pepper, lay it on buttered toast, and put into a hot oven for five minutes.

CHICKEN PUDDING.—Cut a chicken into pieces, season, and dredge with flour; place in a basin with a few mushrooms, previously stewed with butter. Add some gravy, cover with thin paste, and steam two hours. Serve in basin.

FRENCH BEANS SALAD.—String some French beans, and boil them whole in plenty of salted water. When cold, dress them with oil, vinegar, pepper, and salt, some tarragon and capers minced, and garnish with hard-boiled eggs, anchovies, and beetroot. The dish must be well rubbed with a shallot.

DRIED FRUITS.—All kinds are much improved by being washed, soaked over night and cooked in the water in which they were soaked. Berries should be stewed only a few moments, other fruits longer. Do not sweeten until they are done, then cook just enough longer to dissolve the sugar.

POTATO CHOWDER.—Take six large potatoes, one onion, one quart of milk, one tablespoonful of butter, two ounces of salt pork and one egg. Cut the pork in small pieces and fry; add the potatoes and onion sliced, cover with boiling water and cook until potatoes are tender; add the milk scalded and the seasoning, and lastly the egg beaten light.

CHEAP CREAM PIE.—One cup of sugar, three coffee cups of milk and one teaspoonful of salt. Let these get boiling hot. While they are heating stir free from lumps, one and one-half cups of flour into one coffee cup of cold milk, then pour it into the boiling milk, stirring constantly till it boils again, then add one teaspoonful of extract of lemon, and set it away to cool. WHITHER BOUND?

A Complicated Canadian Problem.

BY J. E. WELLS.

We Canadians are just now in a most peculiar position. Perhaps all history might be ransacked in vain for an instance of a country, possessed of anything like the population, resources, and intelligence of the Canada of to-day, standing hesitatingly at the cross-roads, with so many diverging highways opening out before it, and with such perfect freedom of choice, so far as any external pressure is concerned. The Globe has thrown open its columns and invited discussion of four different propositions, each involving to a very great degree the future history and well-being of the country, and each having its quota of earnest advocates. But, as a matter of fact, it is evident that the currents of popular opinion are just now flowing not into four, but at least six distinct channels. Considered from a national point of view some of these may, it is true, be regarded but as subdivisions or co-ordinate branches of the larger "streams of tendency." The four leading possibilities which just now divide and classify are in relation to the United States, 1st, political Union, or Annexation, and 2nd, Political Independence with Unrestricted Reciprocity or Commercial Union; with relation to Great Britain, 1st Independence, and 2nd, continued connection, either in the present colonial relation, or in some form of closer alliance now vaguely designated Imperial Federation. Or you may, for the sake of clearness, tabulate the conditions somewhat differently but with the same general result.

CANADIAN PUBLIC SENTIMENT

A. AS RELATED TO THE UNITED STATES.

I.—Annexation.

II.—Independence with (a) Commercial Union, (b) Unrestricted Reciprocity.

B. AS RELATED TO GREAT BRITAIN.

I.—The Present Colonial relation Continued.

II.—Imperial Federation.

III.—Independent National Existence.

But, as will be seen on inspection, this sex-angular arrangement does not exhaust all the possibilities of the situation since, as many think, we may still retain our colonial relation to the mother country and at the same time enter into an agreement for Unrestricted Reciprocity, or even Commercial Union with the United States. Hence if one were anxious to multiply subdivisions by way of illustrating the peculiarities of the case, the following classification might be substituted:

I.—The Colonial Relation as at present.

II.—The Colonial Relation with (a) Unrestricted Reciprocity; (b) Commercial Union.

III.—Independence, with present tariff arrangement.

IV.—Independence with (a) Unrestricted Reciprocity; (b) Commercial Union.

V.—Imperial Federation.

VI.—Annexation.

Here we have in reality not six, but eight distinct issues presented for our choice, and one of the eight we must definitely choose before very long.

One peculiar and most gratifying characteristic of this singular state of affairs is, as before said, that so far as appears, the people of Canada are perfectly free to look all possibilities and contingencies fairly in the face, and make their selection, untrammeled by any considerations, but those of self-interest, sentiment, and social and political affirmity. There is not, probably, the slightest reason to fear any attempt at coercion, on the part of either of the two great powers who are

SPECIALLY CONCERNED

Surely one who labors so constantly and so well, enduring disappointments and misfortunes for those depending on him, those so fondly dear to him, deserves a little kindness and thoughtfulness, a little tender attention at their hands, and more than all these, does he deserve patience and respect. After being out in the world working to obtain the wherewithal with which to meet the many bills—rent, provisions, dry goods, millinery, tuition, physican's charges—bills of all kinds coming due every day, often being compelled to put off many or effect a compromise, with the coming of the night and the time to lay aside active business cares for a time, the longing for rest that comes over the weary father, can only be gratified at his own fireside, beside those he loves and labors for; and surely it isn't hard to turn the care and thoughtfulness of years, with a little patience and sweet kindness when craved by a weary and discouraged husband or father; and surely it savors of heartlessness to taunt him with the epithet "penurious" when his pocket-book is empty, or to designate the possible irritability of his utter weariness as "cross." Patiently, day by day, he toils on, often to go home when the day is spent and its labors over, to find dullness when brightness and good cheer should rule, cross words, sullen looks and impatience, when his heart is longing for kindness and love.

The life the average wife leads is no sinecure, I know. Cares, many and weighty, beset her path on every side; yet she has advantages the head of her family lacks. Her work may stop for a time and may be caught up, without any very serious results; but with the other, not very often can the lost be regained, and he feels acutely how much is depending on him, and so long as strength holds out keeps going. Despite repeated failures, a step growing gradually slower day by day, furrowed lines of care in his worn face, the once dark locks turning to gray, he yet toils on asking of his loved ones only appreciation of his efforts in their behalf, only little kindness and thoughtfulness. If we all would only look on "father" ever and under all conditions, as commanding our greatest respect and veneration, would strive to emulate the noble example of steadfastness of purpose and loyalty to dear ones under his care and protection, that he is setting us day by day; remember that to be compelled to refuse a request because of incapability to grant it, hurts him much more than the disappointment does us; if we would strive always to accept the truth, bow to the inevitable with good grace, however unpalatable such a course may seem,—then would father's cares be made lighter, his days be made longer and brighter and all our homes be brighter and happier thereby.

Pancakes in Variety.

On cold winter mornings pan cakes of all kinds hold an important place at the breakfast table; the buckwheat cake the most cherished of all. When properly made this is the most delicious of all the griddle cakes, but it has been said against it when made from yeast or risen over night that it was difficult to make light and sweet, and that disagreeable effects frequently followed its eating. is found that by the use of baking powder to raise the batter these objections have been entirely overcome, and that buckwheat cakes are made a most delicious food, light, sweet, tender and perfectly wholesome, that can be eaten by anyone without the slightest digestive inconvenience. Once tested from the following receipt no other will be used: Two cups of buckwheat one, cup of wheat flour, two tablespoons of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt, all sifted well together. Mix with milk into a thin batter and bake at once on a hot griddle.

The purest and richest syrup is made by three coffee cups of milk and one teaspoonful of salt. Let these get boiling hot. While they are heating stir free from lumps, one and one-half cups of flour into one coffee cup of cold milk, then pour it into the boiling milk, stirring constantly till it boils again, then add one teaspoonful of extract of lemon, and set it away to cool. This will make three pies. Bake six crusts and fill them with the mixture.

POTATO SALAD.—When one is anxious to prepare supper quickly, a leading dish can be arranged right after dinner with the potatoes left from the meal. Cut them into nice slices with a few slices of onions between, a little salt; then pour over a dressing made as follows:—One egg well beaten, into which put a tablespoonful of sugar and one of water; beat again, add a cup of vinegar, and butter the size of an egg; let it just come to a boil, remove from the fire and add a teaspoonful of mixed mustard; pour over the potato, set away covered till tea-time.

Notes.

To remove white spots from furniture rub with spirits of camphor.

Finger marks may be removed from varnished furniture by rubbing them with a soft woollen cloth, moistened with sweet oil.

To blanch almonds, shell them, pour boiling water on them, and let them stand a few minutes. Then remove the skins which will slip off easily, and dry them in a towel.

Mix a little carbonate of soda with the water in which flowers are immersed, and it will preserve them for a fortnight. Common saltpetre is also a very good preservative.

Plaster, brick and statuettes may be cleaned by dipping them into thick liquid cold starch, i. e., clear starch mixed with cold water, then drying them, and when the starch is washed off, the dirt comes with it.

A lamp standing for some time in a cool room, and then filled full of cold oil, will run over through the expansion of the oil when taken where it is warm. Then the lamp is blamed for leaking. To obviate this, never fill the lamp quite full.

With very little labor, washing silver in water in which a teaspoonful of ammonia has been added, will keep the silver with a white polish, and glassware will polish much more easily if washed in water to which ammonia has been added.

Another recipe for cleaning silver, is highly recommended; Mix two ounces of ammonia, two of prepared chalk, and eight ounces of rain water; apply with a soft flannel and rub with chamois skin. For the filigree work use a silver brush.

Any woman who wishes to preserve her shoes as long as possible, will strictly avoid the use of prepared, so-called, French dressing. It undoubtedly cracks the leather and makes it rotten. Far better is white of egg, or some good oil—olive or sweet oil—applied with a bit of flannel. It keeps the color of the leather, and shoes thus treated do not harden after being thoroughly wetted. The oil is the proper dressing for patent leather—linseed oil, some shoe-makers say. It is first rubbed on, and then polished with a dry flannel. Patent leather treated in this way does not crack or become dull after wetting.

Giving Her Away.

Snobberly—"Have you ever crossed the ocean, Miss Flirty?"

Miss Flirty—"No, Mr. Snobberly, I have a dread of the water. I don't think I ever could be induced to embark in a ship of any kind."

"How about a court-ship, sis?" asked Jonny, Miss Flirty's younger brother.

contingencies fairly in the face, and make their selection, untrammeled by any considerations, but those of self-interest, sentiment, and social and political affirmity. There is not, probably, the slightest reason to fear any attempt at coercion, on the part of either of the two great powers who are in the matter. The situation is really unique in this respect. It is more than doubtful if in all history a parallel case could be found; that is to say, a case in which, on the one hand, a people could exist in perfect security, beside a great nation of ten times its strength and earnestly desirous of annexing them and their country; and a case in which, on the other hand, a people constituting a valuable colony of a great empire, could choose between continual subordination, national independence, annexation to another state, with a moral certainty that their deliberate choice, whatever it might be, would not be forcibly interfered with.

But, it may be asked at the outset, is it really true that we are at the cross-roads? Is there a real necessity for making any of the changes indicated? Is not the Dominion going on very well as it is? Do not the people of Saxon and Celtic descent who inhabit it manage to live, in the main, in tolerable comfort and independence? Have not the older provinces all the indications of moderate wealth and prosperity in their comfortable homes, their fine churches, their numerous and well-equipped schools and universities, their costly and in some cases magnificent public buildings, their prosperous mercantile and manufacturing establishments, their well-to do official and business classes, with here and there a sprinkling of Knights and millionaires, etc?

In answer to such questions, which will suggest themselves to many minds, it might be sufficient to point to patent facts. It is a patent fact that the feeling of unrest, bordering on discontent, is in the air. The impression is widespread, almost universal, that things cannot remain as they are, that important if not radical, change is inevitable; in a word, that federation has gone nearly as far as it can go along the present lines, and that we are on the eve of a new departure. Else what means all this which are constantly going on on the platform, in the press, and even in Parliament? Why is it that one can hardly take up even a country newspaper in which he will not find articles or letters advocating one or the other of the changes above enumerated?

Going a step farther and inquiring into the causes of this general political unrest, some of them at least, it will be seen, are not far to seek, though various and somewhat complex. In the first place, it has become obvious to many of the more thoughtful, even of those who were its ardent promoters, that Confederation has not been a success. It has failed, to a large extent, in accomplishing the first great end for which it was brought about, the creation of united sentiment. The Maritime provinces, Nova Scotia in particular, entered the union with reluctance in the first place. In fact the last named Province, as the discontented never fail to remind us on occasion, was legislated into the confederation, not only without the sanction, but against the will of the great body of her people. At no time during the twenty-one years of confederation, probably, have a majority of Nova Scotians cordially accepted the Union, and there can scarcely be a doubt that were a peaceful way out of it pointed out, and a plebiscite taken to-morrow upon the question, freed from all partisan and other complications, a large majority would vote for separation. This is sufficiently clear from the fact that a local administration hostile to Confederation is maintained in power. True, a quasi sanction of the present order of things seemed to have been gained in the result of the last election, but it is no secret that that result was mainly due to and promise of expenditure of Dominion funds for local objects—a growing practice which is in itself, not less inimical to the stability of the Confederation than to political morality. In New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the manifestations of dissatisfaction have been less positive and emphatic, but it is clear to all observers that the inhabitants of these provinces, as a whole have no real love for the Union, no enthusiasm for its success. They scarcely recognize themselves as Canadians, and not infrequently are almost ready to repudiate the designation.

Turning to the other extremity of the Dominion, the situation is scarcely more hopeful. Every observant visitor of Manitoba and the North West must have been struck with the feebleness of the attachment to Canada shown by very many, at least, of the citizens. Though a large proportion of them are from the older provinces, the bond of nationality already seems to have become attenuated to a mere thread. The effect of distance and divergence of local interest has been greatly increased by the galling chain of the tariff, of which more anon, and by the persistent attempt of the Ottawa authorities to keep the settlers under the feet of the great railway monopoly. With the filling up of the prairies, the centre of population and so of political powerwill gradually move, westward, and the probability is that at no distant day it may be located west of Lake Superior. But present indications are that unless some very powerful influences can be brought to bear to foster community of interest and sentiment, it will be very difficult when that day comes or even before, to hold the Northwest in its present relations to old Canada. Other causes of the prevailing unrest must be deferred to another article.

In A Leopard's Den.

"Cigar" was a Hottentot, and a mighty hunter of both large and small game. His skill in the use of fire-arms was so great that report credited him with having shot several white men. Circumstances made Cigar the guide and companion, in South Africa, of Parker Gilmore, who won his heart by treating him with kindness. One night, as they sat together on the wagon-box, Cigar told his master the story of an adventure with a leopard, which we condense from the author's "Days and Nights in the Desert":

One day, while looking out for buk, Cigar came across the spoor of a leopard, a beast far more cunning and dangerous than a lion. The Hottentot's gun was an old flint-lock musket, which did not always go off. But he was nearly out of ammunition, and the leopard's skin would buy him a trade-bag of powder; so he followed the leopard's spoor from stone to brush, and from stump to tree.

The chase was a long one and led the hunter to a rocky ravine, where the tracking would have been difficult and dangerous had not a pack of baboons unexpectedly come to his aid. When the baboons discovered their enemy stealthily creeping among the rocks, they followed at a safe distance, howling out their rage and hatred.

Cigar heard the cries and made for an elevated rock, whence he saw the leopard ascend the opposite side of the ravine and enter a cleft in the rocks. Knowing that the leopard had gone into her den, Cigar selected a hiding place within easy range of the ledge on which the cave opened, and waited for the animal to come out.

As soon as the baboons began to howl the

Some Little Things.

The little things we shall now speak of are appropriate as the cold weather is about to begin.

1. See to it that the children thoroughly warm their feet before going to school, and on returning home. They are seldom disposed to do it of themselves. Many a serious cold, or other inflammatory attack, might be prevented by attention to this precaution.

2. Teach the children, when out of doors, to keep their mouths closed, and breathe through their nostrils. This prevents the air—the temperature of which may be zero—from striking directly on the tonsils and the larynx. As the nasal passages are kept constantly warmed by the breath from the heated lungs, the inbreathed air is warmed, as it passes circuitously through them.

3. Children who are liable to inflammation and swelling of the tonsils, or to troubles in the ear, should wear hoods that come well over on the forehead and well down over the neck. Hats are dangerous for such children, and so are bonnets, unless care is taken to bring them down over the side of the head.

4. In our cities and large towns especially children are inclined to sit together on the stone doorsteps, which are often ice-cold. This practice needs to be guarded against. Every thoughtful mother will readily see how dangerous it is for her girls.

5. On returning from a cold walk or ride, throw off all but the home clothing at once. The outer clothing is nearly at the temperature of the outer atmosphere, and, if kept on, must absorb much heat, which might otherwise have come to the wearer immediately.

6. In dressing and undressing in a cold room, move about as little as possible, when the slippers are off. The carpet under the feet is warmed by abstracting heat from the feet, and the person has the advantage of it; while every change takes additional heat to warm a new place. In undressing keep the slippers on as long as convenient; in dressing, put them on as soon as possible.

7. If a chamber is without woolen carpet, be sure to have a woolen mat or rug or bit of carpeting near the bed on which to stand.

8. All slippers for use in cold weather should have extra inner soles, to lift the feet from the cold floor and to retain the natural heat. Where nothing else can be had, such soles can be cut from cardboard; a thickness of woolen cloth should be stitched on each side.

9. For women in the kitchen slippers made of woolen uppers and thick felt soles are desirable. Slippers are preferable for home use to buttoned boots, as they facilitate the warming of the feet, which is otherwise apt to be duly neglected.

Practical.

Make starch with soapy water. It keeps the iron from sticking and makes a glossy surface.

Coffee and tea should never be given to children at night. They disturb the nerve system and make the children cross and peevish.

Tomato vinegar is patented in England. It is made by reducing ripe tomatoes to pulp, steeping the pulp in water twenty-four hours, then drawing off the liquid, adding sugar and allowing it to ferment.

To remove indentations from furniture, wet the indented places well with warm water; then take some brown paper five or six times doubled and well soaked in water, and cover with it the bruises. Then apply to the paper a hot flat-iron until the moisture is evaporated, and, if the indentations have not disappeared, repeat the application until the whole surface is completely level.

Boiled or roasted onions are a specific for colds on the chest. They may not agree

MANHOOD

How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

elevated rock, whence he saw the leopard ascend the opposite side of the ravine and enter a cleft in the rocks. Knowing that the leopard had gone into her den, Cigar selected a hiding place within easy range of the ledge on which the cave opened, and waited for the animal to come out.

As soon as the baboons began to howl the leopard came forth from her den, followed by two cubs, about twelve weeks old. Thereupon the baboons forsook the Hottentot, and directed their attention to the leopard, who had extended herself upon the ledge, and lay on her side, in order that the cubs might more easily take their food.

Cigar having taken time for a steady aim at her heart, fired, and the beast rolled over on her back dead. The cubs ran into the cave and the baboons scuttled up the rocks. Cigar ran to the ledge, skinned the leopard, kicked the carcass into the ravine, and then considered how he should secure the cubs alive.

The interior of the cave was dark, and low in the roof, but smooth on the floor, which was thickly covered with sand. Cigar crawled on his stomach to the end of the cave, where he groped about and soon touched a spitting and hissing cub. With much trouble and many scratches and bites, he secured it and brought it out into the daylight, where he left it lying on the ledge with its four feet tied together.

On re-entering the cave, Cigar took with him his loaded musket, thinking that the father might return and discover him rifling his home.

The second cub had squeezed itself into such a deep crack that it took the Hottentot half an hour to draw it out. While tying its feet, the little light failed, all was dark within. There could be but one cause for the darkness, and the Hottentot prepared for the fight that must end in the death of hunter or leopard, or of both.

He knew, even in the darkness, where his foe was, for the leopard's eyes glowed like balls of fire. The roof was so low that the animal could not spring upon the hunter, and it had to advance slowly, stretching out its body to its full length.

Anxiously Cigar took aim; the report answered the snapping of the lock; the leopard was struggling in front of the man. The Hottentot reloaded his gun—a slow process on account of the constrained position—and then, knowing that the wounded beast was struggling toward him, shoved forward the musket. Its muzzle touched the leopard's body. Cigar pushed the gun, and pressed the trigger. There was a stunning report and then all was still. He had won.

It took him a long time to crawl over the dead beast, so closely was it wedged in the passage, and a longer time to draw out the carcass. His first shot had smashed the animal's lower jaw, and the second had entered the chest and passed along the spine to the root of the tail, where it lodged.

The brave hunter sold the cubs and the skins to a party of English gentlemen, for nearly fifty dollars in trade and cash.

His First Night Out.

Bride (of a month)—My husband seems to be out very late to night.

Maid—Yes'm; it's after 11 o'clock.

"Mercy on me! Do you suppose he could have met some former sweetheart, and——"

"No, indeed, mum; the butler tells me your husband is at the club having a good time with his bachelor friends, and I think, ma'am, you ought to do something about it."

"Why, of course. How thoughtless I am! Get me that box of phosphorus from the cabinet."

"Dearie me! You ain't going to commit suicide?"

"Suicide! You must be crazy. I'm going down to the front door to rub phosphorus on the keyhole."

and cover with it the bruises. Then apply to the paper a hot flat-iron until the moisture is evaporated, and, if the indentations have not disappeared, repeat the application until the whole surface is completely level.

Boiled or roasted onions are a specific for colds on the chest. They may not agree with every one, but to persons of good digestion they will not only be found to be a most excellent remedy for a cough and the clogging of the bronchial tubes, which is usually the cause of the cough; but if eaten freely at the outset of a cold they will break up what promised, from the severity of the attack, to have been a serious one.

Why do so many women object to methods of making their work easier? Some say it looks lazy? Nonsense. Men always improve such contrivances to the utmost and are never called lazy for so doing. Now, for instance, why should not a woman have a chair high enough to sit in for many operations of kitchen and cooking work, arranged to permit a free use of the arms? It would promote health, save strength and prevent much weariness.

Because man is the only animal that can laugh one might naturally conclude that he has always laughed, but such is not the case. At least laughter, as our expression of merriment or pleasure, has only been in vogue for a short time as compared with the age of the race. The Puritans and Quakers who came to America a couple of hundred years ago held it to be a misdemeanor to longh boisterously or heartily, and even to this day their descendants regard laughing as being indecorous, if not actually unbecoming to a Christian.

How we do hate that expression "genteel employment!" There is only one thing worse—that is the term used by a young woman who says she is willing to do "anything not menial." Now, doubtless there are some employments more congenial than others, something we all prefer—but silly talk about menial work has ruined the career of many a working woman. According to its Saxon derivation, menial simply means anything connected with the household, the most honorable employment of a gentlewoman, according to old-style ideas. The impression that any form of honest work lowers the social standing is too absurd to be considered, and deserves to be pushed out of sight with the lumber of bygone centuries.

HEALTH.

Unimpeded Perspiration.

Among the various parts of the human body none seems most strikingly suggestive of design than the skin, regarded as part of the excretory system. A single sweat-gland with its spiral duct, seen under the microscope, is marvellous if considered as a product of evolution, but when we consider that according to the calculations of Eichhorn there are no fewer than 10,000,000 of these glands scattered through the skin, the complete system seems as if must be the result of special design very specially carried out. Assigning an average length to each, if straightened, of about one-sixth of an inch, which is short of the truth, their total length, for a human body of average size (with a surface of fourteen square feet), amounts to more than twenty six miles. Through these twenty-six miles of tubing, divided up into 10,000,000 sections, the perspiration is constantly exuding, passing away in the form of invisible vapor except when formed rapidly as during violent exercise, or in certain forms of disease.

The fluid which thus passes away is chiefly water, in which minute quantities of animal and saline matter are dissolved, with lactic acid, nitrogen, and carbonic acid (or carbon dioxide). It is estimated that on the average, the sudorific glands remove each day from the body about 2½ lbs of watery vapor. But the amount varies largely, not only from day to day, but from hour to hour; besides being different with different individuals. In a warm hall or theatre in which two thousand people are gathered together, a ton of vaporous or liquid perpiration will be excreted in the course of a single hour—the total length of the sweat glands in action during the evening being no less than 57,000 miles, or more than 2¼ times the circumference of the earth.

NATURE INSISTS ON A FREE SKIN.

Since death results when the cutaneous respiration is absolutely or in a large degree interrupted, it will be understood that even partial interruption of the process must have mischievous effects. These, apparently, are not usually local, that is, the part of the body where the pores are clogged does not appear to suffer directly from the interruption of the cutaneous respiration, but the general health is affected. Otherwise the use of plasters, covered with skin on the outside or made of non-porous materials, would be locally disastrous. As it is, such plasters are usually too small to do much mischief by interfering with the perspiration. The injury to the skin done by such appliances as foolish persons put on the face and arms with the idea of improving the appearance probably does not arise directly from the clogging of the sudoriparous and sebaceous glands, being due rather to physical than to physiological causes; yet there is something singularly perverse in the folly which, where nature has indicated the necessity for a free skin, insists on obstinately clogging the skin with matter which must be mischievous, even though neutral in chemical constitution, and which usually—as in the case of pearl powder, for example—is very far from being neutral.

Although it is absolutely essential to health that the perspiratory pores should be kept free from obstruction and in a state of due activity it must not be forgotten that there is room for error on the side of excess in this as in so many other matters. Ne quid nimis is a golden rule in all such cases. There are many, however, who seem to think that because by cleaniness and the frequent use of the cold or tepid bath the action of the sweat glands is encouraged and the health preserved, therefore it must be still better to use the hot bath frequently, and even occasionally to use sudorifics

A DOG-FACED GIRL.

Her Expression, Gait, and Speech Have Canine Peculiarities.

In a lonely cabin on the banks of Otselic Creek, in the town of Willett, Cortland county New York State, may be found a remarkable freak of nature, known through the county roundabout as the "dog-faced girl." Here mother and daughter named respectively Orilla and Sarah Walls, live alone, and in poverty, gaining a precarious support by picking berries and gathering roots and herbs, and from gifts at the hands of the numerous visitors whom curiosity brings to their hut.

The peculiarity of the dog-fased girl's features lies in the chin, mouth and nose, which protrude from the head and neck to an excessive and unnatural degree, and in a shape strikingly like a dog's snout or muzzle. Otherwise she is well formed and fully developed for a girl of 15 years, and is notably robust and active. But she is weak-minded, and the wonderful thing about her imbecility is its canine characteristics in voice and movement.

Up to about 10 years old the girl persisted in running about on all fours, and in this posture she could outrun any child of her age. Her vocal utterances, also, were marvellously like the barking or howling of a dog. As she approached the period of womanhood she learned to walk erect, and her voice lost something of its canine tones, but her features and utterances are still so unmistakably doglike as to attract marked attention and wonder.

She has a constant stream of visitors, including physicians and scientists as well as ordinary curiosity mongers, and these are told truthfully that her father, who died shortly after her birth, was in no way malformed or peculiar. Her mother is good looking in feature and figure, and ordinarily intelligent. None of the dog-faced girl's visitors have as yet suggusted any plausible theory of the freak which gave her to the wor d.

Wheat Crop Shortage.

There is a short wheat crop in the United States and Canada—the shortage, the crop being compared with that of last year, being about 37,000,000 bushels. The quantity already exported is stated to be nearly or quite equal to the annual average, and the home price is at present so high as to prevent further exportation. As the visible supply of wheat is reported to be not more than adequate for domestic consumption, it is unlikely that there will be any material decrease in the price of wheat, and dear, or at least dearer bread is to be one of the conditions of the coming winter. But bread, especially winter bread, need not necessarily be made of wheat, or of rye, even; corn bread is not only nutritious, it is delicious when properly made, and it can be made in many excellent and attractive varieties. The corn crop of the present year is exceedingly large, and the cereal is consequently cheap. The meal of the finer varieties makes an excellent substitute for wheat bread, being, in the opinion of many, much more palatable, and containing ever so much more of brawn and muscle making qualities. Now that wheaten flour is growing dearer, the price of the loaf increasing or the size of it decreasing, and the cold weather, which imparts wholesomeness to corn meal, coming on, corn bread should be given a trial. To the breakfast table, at least, it adds a most appetizing attraction.

That the price of flour and hence bread will be higher during the next few months than it has been during the last twelve will hardly admit of denial, and yet we are tempted to doubt whether the sudden advances that have been made in the price of

The Mormons.

The hold of the Mormons upon Utah Territory is fast being weakened. Since 1882 the provisions of the law against the practice of poylgamy have been enforced with increasing severity, and during the past year or so Cannon, the head or the Church, has been a fugitive from justice. On emerging from his retreat the other day he was promptly arrested, and will, no doubt, be compelled to serve a term of imprisonment as a reward for his unlawful deeds. The heaviest blow which the Church has yet received, however, is that dealt it by the Snpreme Court of Utah in the judgment by which it pronounces the dissolution of the Church as a corporation, and decrees the confiscation of all its property for school purposes in the Territory. As its wealth and its right to tax its adherents have in the past been the chief sources of the Church's power, it is thus reduced to a state of weakness which is certain to endanger its very existence. It loses all its buildings, save those used for purposes of worship, its right to mantain military and police systems, its control of the courts and of all secular affairs in the Territory— in short, it is relegated to the position of a Church only, free to exercise such functions as pertain to religious bodies, and no other. It is no longer the State Church of Utah, and is put upon precisely the same basis as other denominations. Its only hold npon the people will be through the preaching of polygamy, the practice of which doctrine involves disfranchisement and liability to criminal prosecution. Since the passage of the Anti-Polygamy law of 1882 and its amendments 500 polygamists have been prosecuted and convicted in the Territory and sentenced to either fine or imprisonment.

Punishing the Gods.

A curious case of punishing the gods is reported by the last mail from Foochow. The idols of a certain temple in that city were those appealed to by persons who desired to be revenged on their enemies. They were supposed to cause death to those against whom prayers to them were directed. Recently the Tartar military commander died suddenly, and the idea got abroad among the people that he had been slain by the idols in question. The viceroy of the province hearing this at once gave orders that they were to be arrested and punished. The prefect was instructed to see the decree carried out, and, armed with the viceroy's warrant, he went to the temple and had fifteen idols arrested. These were of wood, and about five feet high. Before being brought for judgment before the prefect their eyes were all put out, so that they should not see who was their judge and be able to trouble him either here or hereafter. After a full investigation a report was sent to the viceroy, who gave orders that the idols should be beheaded, their bodies cast into a pond, and their temp'e sealed up forever, to prevent them irom troubling the peace of the town in future.

A Sand Bag for the Sick Room.

Many persons are acquainted with the virtues of the hot water bag, but an exchange suggests that a sand bag is still better.

Get some clean, fine sand, dry it thoroughly in a kettle on the stove; make a bag about eight inches square of flannel, fill it with the dry sand, sew the opening carefully together, and cover the bag with cotton or linen cloth. This will prevent the sand from sifting out, and also enable you to heat the bag quickly by placing it in the oven or on top of the stove. The Herald of Health says that after once using this you will never again attempt to warm the feet or hands of think that because by cleanliness and the frequent use of the cold or tepid bath the action of the sweat glands is encouraged and the health preserved, therefore it must be still better to use the hot bath frequently, and even occasionally to use sudorifics when they are not called for medicinally. This is a mistake and may prove a serious mistake in the case of persons constitutionally disposed to perspire freely.

The Oil Glands.

Nearly two and a half millions of sweat glands pour out upon the surface of the body a watery fluid, which aids in keeping the skin soft, and, by its evaporation, in regulating the bodily temperature.

Beside these sweat glands, the skin contains the so-called sebaceous glands, that exude opaque and oily matter. The ducts convey it either directly to the surface, or into the upper portion of the hair follicles—the cavities from which the hair proceeds.

The oil is designed to help keep the skin supple, and especially to promote healthiness of the hair. These glands are absent from the under part of the feet and hands, and are most abundant in the scalp, face, canal of the ear and about the nose and mouth. Those in the ear secrete the ear-wax. An excess in the secretion renders the face shiny; a deficiency renders the skin and hair dry and harsh.

The glands are sometimes obstructed, when the oil becomes thick, or when there is a neglect of cleanliness. This gives rise to papulæ, or pimples, which on being pressed out through the narrow mouth of the oil duct, resemble worms, or grubs. They are frequently called worms, naturally enough, since the hardened dirt on the outer end looks like a head; but they are only thickened oil, though occasionally a minute living worm chooses one of them for his abode.

Occasionally the more fluid elements of the oil are absorbed, leaving only the solid, and these harden into cutaneous calculi. Or the obstructed secretions—yellow, half liquid and half solid, like putty or mortar—may form small tumors on the eye brows, face, neck and head. They should be cut out when small, or destroyed with caustic. Still, their only harm is in the deformity they cause.

The various forms of acne, or pimple, are due to inflammations of these glands. They occur mainly at the period of puberty, and in the years immediately following, and are regarded as due to the constitutional changes then in process. There is at that period a languid and torpid condition of the skin, a tendency to the accumulation of sebaceous matter, and a congestion of the follicles.

The treatment consists in removing any exciting cause that may exist, improving the nutritive power of the skin and the general system, and stimulating the parts affected. There should also be close attention to diet and habits of life.

Acute Sore Throat.

Among the best remedies for this common affection is hot water. It should be applied outside and inside; outside by means of flannel wrung out of water as hot as can be borne, applied to the throat and well covered, twice a day for fifteen minutes or half an hour. Gargle hot water, as hot as can be borne, every fifteen minutes or half an hour until relieved. Drink plenty of hot water so as to get into a profuse perspiration. A few hours of this treatment will effect a cure in simple cases.

Age Affects Poetry.

Office boy (to editor)—There's a lady outside, sir, with some poetry.

Editor—How old is she?

'Bout seventeen.

Show her in.

That the price of flour and hence bread will be higher during the next few months than it has been during the last twelve will hardly admit of denial, and yet we are tempted to doubt whether the sudden advances that have been made in the price of grain and flour can be sustained for more than a few weeks. It almost always happens that the holder of a staple commodity is quick to seize upon an excuse for raising its selling price, and, so far as retailers are concerned, prices once raised are frequently maintained after the cause for the increase has passed away. But dealers in wheat and dealers in flour have to meet a keen competition, which when duly brought to bear, cannot fail to reduce prices to at least a reasonable level. The advances in the price of wheat have been very largely speculative. How far these increases are justified by the shortness of the wheat crop the future alone can determine, but it seems to us not improbable that the law of supply and demand will operate to place the average selling price of wheat at a point considerably below that which it now holds, and that the western millers, having better opportunities afforded them of purchasing their raw material, will be forced by competition to make lower prices for flour than those which have recently prevailed.

Praying for Gladstone.

A recent issue of the Dundee "News" contains the following letter:—"Dear Mr. Editor: We are all aware that there is nothing impossible to God. We all know that He has made the dead to rise, the deaf to hear, the blind to see, the lame to walk, that prayer was offered up by the Church, and that St. Peter was liberated out of prison. Now, what I am drifting at is this: Why should not all the lovers all over this earth of Mr. Gladstone join in prayer at the same time in one body and send up a petition to God, who is so good to us, to renew Mr. Gladstone's years and make that noble man into youth again, say the years of 21, with all the knowledge and wisdom and goodness that he (Mr. Gladstone) now possesses, and that God would spare Mr. Gladstone full health and strength to see another 80 years in this world to do all the good he intends to do. Dear Mr. Editor, you should start as the leader in this the greatest work you ever did or ever shall do or any other man. I don't thing for a moment that God would refuse the petition of so many millions of His children, and who knows but you might be crowned with much glory. You can do this. There is no denial. Dear Mr. Editor, I never asked a favour of you before and I hope you will not refuse this the first."

The Raw, Cutting Winds

Bring to the surface every latent pain. A change of even a few degrees marks the difference between comfort and pain to many persons. Happily disease now holds less sway. Science is continually bringing forward new remedies which successfully combat disease. Polson's Nerviline—nerve pain cure—has proved the most successful pain relieving remedy known. Its application is wide, for it is equally efficient in all forms of pain, whether internal or external. Ten and 25 cents a bottle, at druggists.

There is only a distinction without a difference between an auburn-haired sweetheart and a red-headed wife.

Nine years ago a Mrs. Manning, of Paris, Ill., vowed that if her son married a certain young lady who was objectionable to her she would go to bed and stay there until she died. The marriage took place, and the mother, true to her resolution, never left her bed until last week, when she was borne to her coffin.

linen cloth. This will prevent the sand from sifting out, and also enable you to heat the bag quickly by placing it in the oven or on top of the stove. The Herald of Health says that after once using this you will never again attempt to warm the feet or hands of a sick person with a bottle of water or a brick. The sand holds the heat for a long time, and the bag can be tucked up to the back without hurting the invalid.

Hypnotism Applied to Justice.

Hypnotism is, for the first time, becomin an instrument in the hands of French justice. A shoemaker named Pichereau, living in the town Paimbœuf, had persistently denied a robbery of 200f., of which he was accused. The judge before whom he was tried went at once to a professional hypnotizer, who had the man's eyes blindfolded, much as if he was giving a public performance, and at last discovered the stolen money under an old stone wall. Thanks to the hypnotizer the shoemaker was convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Bismarck's Guards.

Prince Bismarck keeps a guard of four soldiers in a small conservatory in the garden of his official residence at Berlin. "After Blind's attempt on my life," he says, "the Emperor insisted that I should have a bodyguard. But I sometimes forgot these good fellows, and once at Versailles, seeing one of them appear suddenly before me in a corner of my garden, I drew my revolver, thinking he meant mischief."

What Ails You?

Do you have obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges from head and throat, sometimes profuse, acrid and watery, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid and offensive; dull, heavy headache most of the time, with occasional "splitting headaches"; are your eyes weak, watery, or inflamed; is there ringing in the ears, with more or less deafness; do you have to hack, cough and gag, in your efforts to clear your throat in the morning; do you expectorate offensive matter, scabs from ulcers, perhaps tinged with blood; is your voice changed and is there a "nasal twang" to it; is your breath offensive; are your senses of taste and smell impaired? If you have all or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common and dangerous of maladies—chronic nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, which is sold by druggists at only 50 cents, will cure it. The manufacturers of this wonderful remedy offer, in good faith, $500 for a case of this disease which they cannot cure.

Use GRANGE'S COUGH-NOT

Mr Russell had his leg broken about midway between the ankle and the knee.

—In a very short time people will be thinking of Christmas souvenirs to send to friends all over the world. Canada is going to furnish one of the most superb Christmas souvenirs ever seen on this Continent. The Montreal Daily Star is issuing a Christmas number at enormous expenre that will be far and away ahead of any previous effort. It will be a grand paper to send to friends in other lands. The publishers have already spent nearly twenty thousand dollars in its production.

—On Tuesday and Wednesday of last week Peter Loveless and Wellington Loveless, his son, were tried for the killing of Wesley Church at Smoke Point, Prince Edward County, a few months ago. R. C. Clute prosecuted for the crown and B. B. Osler, Q. C., defended the prisoners. The addresses to the jury of both counsels and of the judge were exceptionally fine, that of Mr Osler being one of the best ever heard in the Bay district. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty.

—Men working what is known as the "oat scheme" have been in this section lately. With what success we have not learned, but understand that they have managed to get a couple of the residents to work with them in taking in the farmers. The scheme is something of this nature. Seed oats are sold at $10 per bushel; the sellers agreeing to purchase the return therefrom next year at the same rate less 25 per cent for their trouble. Having disposed of the seed oats at this high figure, the work of the men is at an end; they never turn up again. Let our farmers give the tramps a wide berth.

—Just received at Chinneck's a special line of Reid and Barton's celebrated flat ware—knives, forks, spoons, etc. These goods sell fast, being A 1 in quality and right in price. Being sole agent in Napanee for this firm Mr. Chinneck is in a position to offer the goods at a bargain. Call and inspect. Engraving will be done free of charge for those purchasing.

—The following regarding the marriage of Miss Ella Daly we take from the Peterborough Examiner: "Yesterday afternoon (Oct 31st) Miss Ella Daly, of this town, daughter of the late Charles Daly, of Napanee, was united in marriage to Dr Cumberland, of Michigan, one of the most prominent young physicians of that State. The ceremony was performed in St. Paul's Presbyterian church by the Rev Mr Cumberland, brother of the groom, assisted by the Rev. E. F. Torrance, M. A. The bride was assisted by Miss Birdie Daly, of Napanee, with whom was associated, as groomsman, Mr. R. S. Latimer, of Sault Ste. Marie. The wedding was strictly private, and a number of the many friends of the bride were unable to gain admittance to the church." THE EXPRESS joins with the many friends in wishing the Dr. and his estimable young bride the best of happiness through life.

—The McGibney family, which appear here on the 21st inst, travel in a $20,000 palace railway coach. In it there are library, drawing-room, kitchen, parlor, and bath-room. Commodious silver, china and linen closets, and ladies' and gentlemen's toilet rooms are conveniently disposed throughout, while adjoining the library a neat burglar and fire proof safe is placed so as to be entirely hidden from view. In addition to these conveniences, there are sixteen berths and two state-rooms. The splendid traveling carriage is provided throughout with electric call bells, and five servants in attendance quickly supply every want. At night, by means of electric lamps, the car is made as light as day, and as it is heated by steam the temperature is the same at all times. Under the cars are ten lockers, in which can be transported enough provisions for a month's supply, a ton of anthracite coal, half a ton of ice, and whatever other articles they may desire.

Scott Act.

Mrs (Dr) Kennedy, of Amherst Island, was on Saturday convicted of a third offence

Jno Wheeler, of the Queen's hotel, was up for a third time and admitted the offence. He was allowed his liberty under suspended judgment, it being shown that he was far gone with consumption.

Thos Lewis, hostler, was found guilty of selling liquor in the Campbell House barn. He was fined $50 and in default of payment committed to gaol.

Eastern Methodist Church.

The hour of the opening of the Sabbath School has been changed from before the morning service to immediately after—12 o'clock noon.

The Young People's Union have completed arrangements for the holding of a series of entertainments during the winter season. The first will be held this (Friday) evening when a good programme will be presented. It will partake of a musical and literary nature. The programme is in charge of the Vocal Society of the Unionfor this week. Refreshments will be served during the parts. The next entertainment will likely be held two weeks from to-night. This evening the time will be definitely announced as well as the form of the programme for the next entertainment.

The Sabbath School have undertaken the getting up of the dramatic cantata entitled Christmas Time, music by Julius Otto. The entire school will take part. From a glance over one of the books we are led to believe that the cantata will be very entertaining, there being exceedingly nice choruses and recitations. Practices are now being held and are largerly attended by scholars. The drilling is under the supervision of Mr. L. H. Bennett.

Town Council Notes.

As will be noticed by treasurer's statement in council minutes the sum of $665 of this year's taxes was paid in by the town collector up to Monday night.

The meeting of Monday night was noted for the prompt manner in which business was transacted. It was in striking contrast with some of the former meetings.

The sooner the council adopts the plan of having all motions written out, the sooner will the time of the council be saved wrangling over what was and was not moved.

Notwithstanding the motion passed some time ago to the effect that there be no more refund of poundage fees the council ordered several amounts to be paid back.

Deputy-reeve Lapum, in endeavoring to carry a point regarding the proposed drain on Dundas-st said, "the earth is softening so much that large stones ooze up." Imagine stones oozing up in soft earth.

Coun. Davis suggested that a tile drain be laid down in the centre of Dundas-st in the neighborhood of Light's factory. At the mention of the word tile several called out "Let's know the commission." The "alderman" succumbed.

If we accept the motion made by coun. Davis the meeting before last as correct (and which, through the absence of coun. Gibbard, was allowed to pass unchallenged at Monday night's session) the council have very little faith in the committee appointed by themselves some time ago to look after the securing of manufacturing industries for the town. In other words the mayor, and couns. Gibbard and Aylesworth, are the only men at the board competent for the work. The services of other individuals, outside the council, have to be called into requisition. The fact is, the motion as recorded in the minute book is not the motion passed at all. Coun. Gibbard suggested that a committee be appointed to memoralize the Cured By B. B. B. When All Else Failed.

Mr Samuel Allan, of Lisle, Ont, states that he tried all the doctors in his locality while suffering for years with Liver and Kidney trouble; nothing benefitted him until he took Burdock Blood Bitters, four bottles of which cured him.

Valuable to Know.

Consumption may be more easily prevented than cured. The irritating and harassing cough will be greatly relieved by the use of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam that cures coughs, colds, bronchitis and all pulmonary troubles.

50 pieces shirtings at 10c per yard; standard goods well worth 12½c.

Fine bleached sheetings, two yards wide, at 25c per yard. Grand values in white cottons, cotton flannels, etc. 5 case pound batts at 15c per pound.

other individuals, outside the council, have to be called into requisition. The fact is, the motion as recorded in the minute book is not the motion passed at all. Coun. Gibbard suggested that a committee be appointed to memoralize the government regarding the location of the agricultural farm, which it is proposed to establish in eastern Ontario, at this place, but the motion as carried went no further. To show how forcibly the matter struck the councilmen we have but to state that coun. Carson held that it was for an agricultural college not a farm, while coun. Bowen held it was for agricultural works. Think of Messrs Hawley, Deroche, Morden and Judge Wilkison seeking industries under the present iniquitous policy.

HIS GOOD LUCK.

A NEW YEAR'S STORY WITH THE SECRET OF SUCCESS IN IT.

WE HAD been talking about the turn of fortune which comes to some people with the New Year. Dr. Mason, the oldest man in the room, said:

I will tell you a story worth writing and printing. I see that it is now the fashionable thing for men and women who have made a little stir in the world to tell all about the books which influenced them and the incidents which turned them into the highways which led to fortune or to fame. Well, I am not famous, thank heaven, but perhaps the experiences of a man who has escaped fame may not be without use to somebody.

I have always believed in luck. I don't attempt to justify my belief. I know that I can't hold my ground in argument against those who say there is no such thing. I only know that I believe in it. The superstition was born in me. There is a proverb in the Castilian tongue which says: "He who expects good luck will surely get it." I read that before I was 12 years old, and at once put faith in it. It confirmed the hope within me, that the future held something exceptionally good for me. Perhaps each one of us has that feeling, but not everybody evolves it into a faith and regularly lives by it. I did.

I had a dreary childhood, a difficult youth and a struggling early manhood. That proverb helped me to go through everything with courage. Usually I hated proverbs. My father had a stock of very disagreeable ones which he showered upon me at all seasons and hours. "They who know nothing fear nothing," "Birds that fly high light low," and others of equally discouraging power were ever on the end of his tongue. But the proverb that promised good luck simply because one expected it was both balm and inspiration to me.

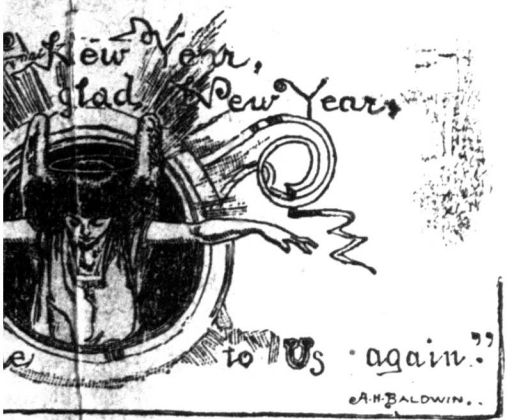
NT., FRIDAY, DEC. 30, 1888. VOL. XXVIII, No. 4.



When playing with other boys and trouble of any kind was imminent I always took the most cheerful ground, and assured them that everything would turn out all right. And I was terribly in earnest, too. I felt that all would go well somehow. The result was that every one took hope and met difficulty and danger as his master, not his victim. The boys soon learned to depend upon me for strength and encouragement, and they stuck to me with romantic devotion. I learned then the wonderful influence one mind can have over others when it recognizes no such thing as fear. Call it superstition, foolishness, what you will; but my faith in that proverb was something marvelous. I will admit, however, that I am of a credulous nature. When I was young I believed every assertion I ever heard or read. I was not a questioner or doubter. If a man asserted something I believed him because I supposed that he knew, else he would not assert. It never occurred to me that he might lie. Being honest myself I believed in the honesty of others.

I lived in the country and I longed to live in the city. My parents were well to do; but it was the custom of that locality to live simply and bring the children up to work. Mental accomplishments did not take high rank in the circle in which I moved for the first fifteen years of my life. I wanted a better education than I was ever likely to

A heavy limb of an old dead tree had broken and fallen upon me. When I "came to" I found myself hurt and somewhat frozen. I dragged myself home only to take to my bed for the remainder of the winter. Such a winter as it was—so bitter and hopeless that at times I almost lost faith in my good luck. I couldn't finish my contract of wood chopping, and so the tin store vanished.

In the spring I was able to be about once more; but thin, pale, weak, and with a bad limp. The doctors said I would never be strong again. This was terrible news to me. Alas! for the good luck I had expected. And yet it came, though not as I had planned. It has a way of doing that, I have noticed.

In the early spring Uncle Zeph came to see us. He was a kind hearted, unselfish man, and he took an interest in me.

"Why, the boy isn't able to do hard work. He must be sent to school and to college," he said, after he thoroughly understood the situation. But my father winced and said nothing. Education was but little respected in those parts.

"What else can be done with him?" asked my persistent uncle. "The boy has a good head. There's something in him. Give him a chance. You surely wouldn't force him to live his life without resources and tools with which to aid himself. It's a shame."

At last it was settled that I was to receive a thorough collegiate education, Uncle Zeph, who was childless, paying half the cost of it. Here was a piece of luck, indeed; better even than anything I had expected. It quite renewed my faith in my only proverb. And it had all come out of what I had deemed a stroke of the hardest kind of luck. Take courage, then, all of you, and don't think because you can't see light ahead of you that there is no light.

Well. I was graduated at last from one of [illegible]. After that I took a medical course and went to what was then considered the far west, Indiana, to practice. Patients came slowly, but I expected good luck, as I had learned to do, and had patience, if no patients.

I was just beginning to be a little known when I fell in love. The young lady who had effected this state of my emotions was Miss Alma Adams. She was very handsome. She had the dark eyes I am so fond of, and a being once more so near the little home circle which held my happiness, I rushed up to her and held out both my hands, saying: "I am so glad to see you. I shall be grateful if you are half as glad to see me."

Her eyes opened wide, with a look that was part pleasure and part astonishment, blended with deprecation. She had the appealing eyes which so often belong to the young who are afflicted with deafness. Something in her look told me that she had not really understood my words, but was honestly glad to see me. So I rattled on telling her how much I had thought of all of them while I had been away, still holding both her hands in a hearty clasp.

"I wish you a Happy New Year and many Happy New Years," I said finally. "Your welcome makes me very, very happy. Now, let us go and find Alma."

"Do you really mean it, Dr. Mason?" and she looked up at me with a strange, yearning expression on her plain face, which was flushing with red, like an early morning sky.

"Mean it? Mean it every word, with all my heart," and I held her hands tighter than ever in my enthusiasm. "Now let us find Alma, for whom I have what I hope may be glad tidings."

She smiled, and her smile was very sweet, although she was so plain. I noticed, too, that her eyes had a strange light in them which made them resemble the eyes we sometimes see in dreams, which speak so much more meaningly than do those we see in our waking hours. This light was the light of joy and nothing else. One does not see it often in woman's eyes. Sometimes only once in a life time.

She slipped her arm in mine and we walked into the house down the wide, old fashioned hall to the sitting room.

"Alma, dear," said Laura, as we opened the door and the tall, dark eyed goddess of my heart arose and came towards us, "Dr. Mason says I have made him very happy, and he wants to tell you of it at once, and so do I."

The goddess glanced at both of us, a faint pink color coming into her white cheek, and smiled at us as she would have smiled at two children, while I was longing to take her in my arms and tell her that I adored her. Instead of greeting me, or giving me a chance to greet her, she bent and kissed Laura, and then turned to me, saying:

"You have won the sweetest heart in the world, Dr. Mason. I congratulate you. I know that you will return an equal amount of good wishes when I tell you that I have promised to marry Mr. Carey. We will be married next month and go to New York to live at once."

I stood, as the novelists say, "rooted to the spot." The whole scene seemed unreal. I, who a few moments before was full of joyful anticipation, now found myself engaged to marry a woman whom I did not love, and hearing the woman I did love tell me that she was soon to marry one of my rivals. At first I could not understand what Alma meant. I thought that she and Laura were enjoying some joke too obscure for me. At last the ply and bring the children up to work. Mental accomplishments did not take high rank in the circle in which I moved for the first fifteen years of my life. I wanted a better education than I was ever likely to get. Somehow I fancied that I would get it, though I could not see how. The holidays always carry me back in memory to some of the main events of my life. I believe that fortune has a habit of making extraordinary changes when the Old Year goes out and the new one comes. At least it has done so more than once in my case; and that is why I now tell this story to you younger people, who naturally think of new leaves of many kinds in connection with the New Year.

I was only 15 years old when one bitter winter I took a contract to chop a large quantity of cord wood. It was one of the few ways boys had in that locality of earning a little money. It seems like a rough way to me now; but we did not think so then. I was up at 5 o'clock in the morning, and by 6 had had my breakfast, and was in the woods sending the echo of my strokes far over the hills. I was working for a purpose. The winter's chopping would give me money enough to start in a small business upon which I had set my heart. It was nothing less than to buy out a tin shop at "The Corners," the nearest village. In imagination I saw myself a "store keeper," at once a person of dignity in the community and highly satisfactory to himself. I soared even higher than that. I saw myself living in a fine house, growing elderly, pompous and fat, and in all probability president of a bank, like Judge Johnson, for whom I turned off the sidewalk every time I met him at "The Corners," as every other youth did, because he was so rich and important.

New Year's day found me in the woods, chopping away as usual. Holidays were not observed in that community, and festivities were as rare as angels' visits. An extra piece of pie in my lunch pail and a bit of something unusual for supper were all that marked the day from all the other crisp, cold winter days. But I thought of its being New Year's, and dreamed my dreams while I made the ax hum. The luck I expected out of that winter's work I could scarcely put in a small kingdom. While I was dwelling upon this interesting theme something snapped far above my head, there was a crash, some blinding flashes of light, and then—I was nowhere, at least consciously.

SENDING THE ECHOES OF MY STROKES

patience, if no patients.

I was just beginning to be a little known when I fell in love. The young lady who had effected this state of my emotions was Miss Alma Adams. She was very handsome. She had the dark eyes I am so fond of, and a placid, unemotional manner that I greatly admired. She was not rich, and I was rather glad of it, because I wanted to win her and to do everything for her myself. I think a man who is a man ought to feel that way. I was very much in love with her, and I thought that she felt more than kindly to me. But I wasn't sure. She was a queer girl. One could never tell of what she was thinking. I put off learning the actual state of her heart until I saw my way clear to a decent practice. In short, till I put some money in my purse.

Miss Adams' parents had in the family a niece about Alma's age, a plain little body, who was somewhat deaf and, therefore, something of a bore to a selfish young fool like me, who had only eyes and ears for the girl he adored. But Laura, this cousin, was good if she was exceedingly plain, and the girls were very fond of each other.

At last my unspoken love became almost a burden. I thought of but little else than Alma. Rivals I had, to be sure, but none whom I really feared. Young Wilcox, son of the richest man in the growing young town, hung around her constantly; and George Carey, a middle aged swell from "the east," was also devoted to her. But I was not afraid.

One evening as I parted from her my manner betrayed more tenderness than I had meant to express, though not more than I felt. In thinking of it afterwards I was happy in remembering that Alma had not seemed surprised or annoyed at my expression of feeling. "And she must have understood," I said to myself. As I walked to my lodgings I determined to tell her outright that I loved her, and ask her to marry me the very next month. The next day I was called away to the bedside of my dying father, and did not return for two months. Then I was a comparatively rich man, with my share of his estate. That is, rich for that time, not for the present.

I returned to Crestfield on New Year's day. I lost no time in going to see Alma. Visions of this moment of happiness had filled my mind for days. I met Laura just coming out of the house. Full of childish delight at hearing the woman I did love tell me that she was soon to marry one of my rivals. At first I could not understand what Alma meant. I thought that she and Laura were enjoying some joke too obscure for me. At last the beaming look in Laura's eyes enlightened me. She, being somewhat deaf, had mistaken my warm greeting for a declaration of love, and responded affirmatively.

"DO YOU REALLY MEAN IT, DR. MASON?"

With Laura's arm still within mine I walked to a sofa and sat down, she by my side. I had not uttered a word since I met Alma. Speech had utterly forsaken me. And, indeed, what could I say? Could I tell the trusting creature by my side that it was all a mistake; that she had misunderstood me; that I did not love her; that I loved her beautiful cousin? No; I was too shocked and dazed to do anything but sit there in silence, with the perspiration standing in cold drops on my face and my eyes staring vacantly ahead of me. I think I could have spoken had it not been that Alma stood before me looking placid and even happy in telling of her engagement to Mr. Carey. I accepted the situation in desperation. The whole face of life had been suddenly changed for me and I saw nothing but gloom ahead.

I thought myself a strong man, but is it any wonder that I wept like any child on my pillow that night? What a New Year's that was! Whither had my expected good luck gone?

I put the best possible face on my misery and went on in the dismal path fate had marked out for me. Since I could not have Alma, what did it matter whom I married? Ugly little Laura would do as well as any woman. It was fortunate that she expected no extraordinary demonstration of affection from me. Truly I could not have given it. My heart seemed frozen or dead. Yet I could not help seeing that she seemed quietly happy. Her plain face actually began to glow with new life, and there were times when she looked almost pretty. It occurred to me that I might forget my own misery by trying to make her happy. The idea was a spark from the mind of infinite love, for it brought a kind of peace to my sick soul.

I threw myself into the role of promised husband with all the energy I possessed. I suggested that we should be married on the same day that was fixed for the wedding of Alma to Mr. Carey. I can assure you that in those weeks I demonstrated, to myself at least, that I had something of the heroic in my nature.

Well, we were married. Alma and her husband went away, and Laura and I "went to housekeeping," as they say of newly married folk. I did my best to give Laura no

OR,

OLIVER BRANDON'S STORY.

By NORA LAUGHER.

CHAPTER V.—SURROUNDED BY SORROWS.

"Where, when the gods would be cruel,
Do they go for a torture? Where Plant thorns, set pain like a jewel?
Ah, not in the flesh, not there!
The racks of earth and the rods
Are weak as foam on the sands,
In the heart is the prey for the gods
Who crucify hearts, not hands."

That Christmas Day when the church bells were ringing merrily across the snow I was conveyed to the gaol at Montreal.

Soon after my arrival I was searched, and to my horror and dismay an Indian clasp set with diamonds of immense value was found concealed in the inner lining of my pocket book and which I recognized as belonging to my Uncle Brandon. Again and again I protested that I could not imagine how it came into my possession which only met with a derisive smile.

How did the Indian clasp become secreted in my possession? Alas, how helpless I was to unravel the diabolical mystery!

The justice room was crowded the morning of my examination, for my position as a Canadian artist and being so well known when a boy in Montreal excited an extraordinary and painful interest. I felt calm and collected at first, but later on I was completely dumbfounded when I saw the detective lay down an opal ring which he stated had also been found in my possession—secreted in my small valise—and which I instantly recognised as a ring my Uncle frequently wore.

There stood Gervase Lerhue, his thin cadaverous face turned towards me, his hands folded placidly. Being sworn upon his oath, he testified as to the loud quarrel between his master and myself and declared the Indian clasp and the opal ring to have been the property of his late master Mr. Marmaduke Brandon. A smothered groan indicating the sorrow and indignation he felt escaped from Jack Irvine. He, with Clifford Fairfax had keenly watched the production of the stolen property and breathlessly listened to Lerhue's damnable evidence against me. I knew full well whatever came they would not believe me guilty.

All appearances were, however, against me; whatever I said had no power to move the bench. The magistrates agreed that sufficient evidence had been adduced against me to fully warrant them in committing me for trial.

With the vile brand of murder upon me I was removed to the cell.

The bitter black months that I, an innocent man, suffered in the gaol at Montraal dragged along drearily. Not hopelessly, however, for Gladys would come as frequently as she could to cheer, me generally accompanied by her mother or sister who for the time had taken up their abode at Montreal. My greatest grief was to see the sorrowful look creeping into Gladys' beautiful face, the mournful o'ershadowing of those dear eyes which never met mine save with the same unflinching gaze of unutterable trust and love. I know now that when everything seemed against me, if I had not had Gladys to think of I must have gone mad.

Jack Irvine spent his time alternately with the detectives in Montreal and with my lawyer, Mr. Haymes, in Toronto, again and almost every day would send me a plentiful supply of newspapers and literature.

The twentieth of March, the day of the trial, came at last. I must pass over the crowded court, the sea of faces looking so pitiably at me. I must not stay to give the damnable evidence of Gervase Lerhue, rendered with a saint-like hypocritical expression of his cadaverous features, nor the corresponding evidence of his deaf old wife, Annette Poor Mrs. Gibson, afraid she should say anything to harm me maintained an almost obstinate silence. They could get little from her except that upon a certain date an old gentleman, purporting to have journeyed from Montreal, called at her house on Jarvis Street, Toronto, and that she believed he stole Mr. Oliver Brandon's pistol to shoot himself with.

The idea of suicide was not entertained by the medical witnesses and Mrs. Gibson's evidence was treated with every sign of unbelief, as though it was merely concocted to procure my release.

Clifford Fairfax's face grew very grave, and soon I missed him from the court.

Hour by hour as the day wore on I fel there was no chance for me. The very fact of the pistol being mine and the Indian clasp and opal ring being found in my possession damned me utterly.

Jack Irvine's massive figure towered nigh above the others, I saw that he could hardly control himself as Gervase Lerhue gave his lying evidence. And I, God alone knows what I endured, but it was for Gladys' sake that I, to outward appearance sat as calm as any ordinary spectator could have

My counsellor pleaded long and earnestly for me as few can plead, but never was guilt brought home to an innocent man so clearly and conclusively.

The jury, after retiring about twenty minutes, which seemed to me like as many hours, found me guilty of wilful murder.

As if in a dream I heard the judge speak, heard women sob convulsively, and heard men whisper words of compassion.

One last thought of Gladys, then a rushing as of water come to my ears and a film passed before my eyes. Jack Irvine regardless of police interference, sprang towards me and I remember no more.

I suppose that I had fainted, for I found myself lying upon my mattrass in the cell where Irvine and the warder had carried me. The man more tender-hearted than most warders, was quite touched by the look on poor Jack's and facebent down and whispered to me "you must try and keep up your spirits, sir, don't give way like this."

About half an hour afterwards I was still lying in the same position in a kind of lethargy, too weak or too miserable to move, when I heard voices outside the door which I immediately recognised as the gaoler's and Clifford Fairfax's.

"It won't do at all, Doctor Fairfax, I have strict orders now not to admit any one to see the prisoner without an order from the governor."

"Sutton," said Fairfax severely. "You forget yourself, I am a medical man and I have an order from the governor to see Mr. Brandon, who is sick, professionally. Come, open the door and let me in."

phial and pouring a few drops of dark liquid into his hand which he rubbed well over my face, neck and hands, staining them the complexion of his own. Then putting on a false brown beard he had in readiness he in the dim light resembled Oliver Brandon in no small degree.

"Now go," said he, warmly shaking my hand, then hastily stuffing the tin can and scraps of hair into my pockets, "for I hear the jaoler coming, I must throw myself face downwards upon the bed, for he will most likely have a lamp with him. Whatever you do, Brandon, don't run. You will find Jack waiting for you in a sleigh not very far from the west corner of the jaol."

He flung himself down upon the hard mattrass. Oh, little did I think that I should never again clasp the kind hand, never again look into the true and noble face of Clifford Fairfax.

"Time is up, Dr. Fairfax, I guess I will get blamed for letting you stay so long," said the jaoler, hurrying me out of the cell and across the prison yard.

I remembered Fairfax's advice not to run, but I walked fast over the still snow-covered ground and found Jack Irvine awaiting me in a sleigh on the road.

"Jump up, Brandon," said he excitedly. "Great Scott! I feared it was Clifford come back. You are as alike as two peas. Hurry up, I must drive like the very devil or we shall miss the train and all will be lost."

It was dusk, but not dark.

Jack drove at a terrific speed, the horses fairly flew over the snow.

We were only just in time to board the train for New York. What an eternity seemed that journey to both of us.

We hastened to one of the largest hotels on Broadway, where Jack unpacked a small valise he had brought with him containing a complete disguise for me, consisting of a suit of clothes for an elderly gentleman a grey wig, beard and moustache and huge pair of foreign-looking spectacles. I arrayed myself with them, standing up a veritable crabby looking, professor-like old man.

Irvine, after giving a few inartistics pulls and touches, burst out laughing.

"Well, upon my word, Oliver, Gladys herself would not know you from Abraham. But who the deuce shall you call yourself, and where shall you go?"

"I guess I had better make for Angus Holroyd's on West 21st Street; he will advise me what to do. I scarcely imagine it will be safe for me to be at large."

Irvine left me as I rang the bell of Holroyd's studio. The door was opened to me by his sister Millicent, a fair, gentle girl, and an artist herself of no mean ability.

"May I see Mr. Homroyd," I asked in a crabbed, shaky voice.

"My brother's name is Holroyd, sir, not Homroyd," she explained, "will you walk into the studio?"

"Yes, I hope he won't keep me waiting long," I said disagreeably as she left the room. When alone I fell back in the old familiar arm chair and laughed immoderately to think that Millie Holroyd did not recognise me.

"I wish to look at some paintings, Mr. Homroyd," I asked as Angus entered the studio, "now, what do you ask for this little water-color. Canadian, is it not?"

"Yes! It is the Rosedale Ravine, near Toronto, but unfortunately it is not for sale. Any thing else that you see I shall be delighted to sell you."

"No, this alone takes me, now what do ou say to $500 for it?"

mad.

Jack Irvine spent his time alternately with the detectives in Montreal and with my lawyer, Mr. Haymes, in Toronto, again and again re-visiting my landlady, Mrs. Gibson. Mr. Haymes was a clever, clear sighted man who never let the grass grow under his feet and he was working his hardest in my behalf. John Irvine had offered ten thousand dollars reward for the capture of the guilty person or persons, but no notice whatever had been taken of it. Although the detectives and police officers were doing their utmost, yet in my heart I knew they all believed me guilty. I felt that not one man outside my own friends—except one of the warders, a man named Brown who often spoke kindly to me—but what believed me to be the perpetrator of that dastardly and cruel deed.

Sometimes for hours I would console myself that surely in this land of justice they could not bring me in guilty. Irvine and Fairfax did not suppose for one moment that they would do so.

They knew me to be innocent. But alas! to others the strong proof of my guilt seemed too overwhelming to admit of dispute.

Often in my solitude it was most pleasant to me to recall as I last saw it the glorious scenery around Fergus and to imagine once more the majestic rushing of the waters in the beautiful ravine below Elora. Often did I think of the dear old Irvineside homestead and recall some of the golden hours spent there. There was something particularly refreshing and grateful in these recollections, for thoughts and associations were thus called forth elevating and tranquilising in their character—which, God knows, I sorely needed.

At other times, in the night most of all, some devil would rise up in my heart filling it full of evil, and in those hours of darkness I felt hardly answerable for what I did. At such times I would walk round and round my prison room, far more resembling some frantic caged wild beast, than a sane human being. I would listen to the clock slowly striking the dragging hours until, thoroughly wearied with pacing up and down, I would fall down upon my mattrass and sleep the merciful sleep of forgetfulness. It was generally in the dead of night that this kind of feelings came over me. At first, being accustomed to an active life I could not get sufficiently tired to sleep at all.

In the morning I would listen to the numerous bells calling people to matins and prayer. I could hear too, the twittering of sparrows above my casement through which the pale sunshine would sometimes cast little rays upon the floor. I could hear, too, the distant sound of the sleigh-bells along the road, sometimes—and oh, how eagerly I listened—the merry happy laugh of the governor's little children mingling with the loud bark of their pet dog, he was a collie, I had seen him once; one day I heard them calling him what sounded to my ears like "Rhino"—the name of Gladys' dog—Ah! what feelinge did that name bring to me, the remembrance of one lovely winter evening. Oh, God, how long ago it seemed, when the very wintry wind was laden with love and happiness. And I felt then that I would give all I possessed in the world, yea, I would even barter Heaven itself for but one hour's freedom to be out in the bright, keen air with Gladys instead of being immured in that living prison-sepulchre.

Generally during the day time I felt cheerful and would read or write for hours, for I could not believe, nay, I would not believe that I should have to remain there much longer.

Angus Holroyd with true friendship spent his brief holidays at Montreal endeavouring to cheer me as much as possible. Fairfax, too, took up his abode at the Windsor

"Sutton," said Fairfax severely. "You forget yourself, I am a medical man and I have an order from the governor to see Mr. Brandon, who is sick, professionally. Come, open the door and let me in."

The gaoler knew that the young army doctor was a friend of the governor's, and, moreover, believing what he said, finally threw open the door but not without some little grumoling.

"Oh! never fear, Sutton, it's all right, I shall be here about half an hour. Now, don't alarm yourself, the governor is aware I am going to stay so long."

Sutton's face brightened, for he knew the governor was engaged in entertaining friends at his house.

"Then, while you are here, Doctor Fairfax, I'll just run off and speak to my wife I have'nt had time to speak to her all day."

"Dr. Fairax is all right, I guess," he muttered to himself as he locked the heavy cell door behind Clifford.

CHAPTER VI.—Dulce Domum.

"What more felicity can fill a creature
Than to enjoy delight with liberty."

As the gaoler locked the massive door behind Fairfax he quickly crossed the cell to me, whispering "be quick, jump up, Brandon, I am come to get you out of this infernal hole!"

"What do you want, Fairfax?" I asked mechanically. "No! I am innocent, nothupon earth would induce me to fly like a criminal."

"Brandon, don't for Heaven's sake talk like a fool. Hurry up, man, think," said he giving me a hard shake "Think, you are condemned to death—to be hanged like a cur, for a crime you know nothing of. Think of little Gladys, it would kill her. For God's sake and her's be a man; there is no time to lose in foolish arguments."

"Then you still believe in my innocence, Clifford," I faltered.

"How can you ask such a thing? You know that I do and I have come to prove it," said he hastily taking some packages from his pockets.

"But what—," I broke down altogether as I saw what he had brought with him, a pair of scissors, a razor, some soap and a tin can of hot water, with which he commenced cropping off my beard and shaving my face clearly, leaving but the moustache like his own. Then and not until then did it dawn upon me what the noble fellow was going to do.

"Stop, Fairfax, for Heaven's sake desist, I cannot, I will not let you do it."

"Don't bother me or I'll cut your throat!" said he, rapidly going on shaving my face.

"But the risk would be fearful for you, Clifford. No, I cannot let you."

"Nonsense, you will have to, now we have got so far and we must hurry up, too," said he quickly stripping off my outer garments and donning them himself. "There is no risk, I tell you. I am not quite such a born son of a gun as to submit to be hanged instead of you. They will find out the mistake in the morning when you will be out of their reach."

"But I am thinking of your regiment ——"

"Hang the regiment," said he half, laughing. Don't fear. I shall escape all right. Now, Brandon," said he, seeing that I was breaking down again, "for Glady's sake you must do this unless you wish to break her heart. It is her keen wit you have to thank, not me for she herself suggested this way of escape for you. You have no alternative, it is either escape now or death like a dog."

"God bless her and you. You are a noble fellow, Fairfax," I said grasping his hand.

"Don't stay for thanks," said he hurriedly taking from his vest pocket a small ou say to $500 for it?"

I knew nothing would tempt him to part with it, for it was not his own work but from the pencil of a beautiful Toronto girl, whom he hoped to make his wife.

"I guess nothing upon earth would tempt me to part with that little sketch, sir. I am very sorry to disappoint you."

"Well, look here, say $1000 for it."

"Nothing you could offer me would induce me to part with it, sir," said he coldly.

"Then young man," said I, severely peering at him through my glasses, "I guess you New Yorkers must have more money than sense," and throwing off my hat, wig and spectacles I burst into a fit of laughter at Angus Holroyd's astonishment and delight.

Holroyd threw up his little black velvet cap, over-turned a Venus and a Niobe off their pedestals, embraced me like a Frenchman or a schoolboy, overturning almost everything in the studio in his joy at my escape, until his sister fearing, he was dealing with a lunatic by the commotion we occasioned burst into the room.

It was arranged that for the present I should live in a small room at the top of the house, lighted by a skylight in the centre of the roof and having no entrance except through the studio, which entrance Angus cleverly barred by a large picture.

In a few days time we learnt of Clifford Fairfax's escape. He had heavily bribed one of the French warders, thereby escaping to Egypt, where his regiment was then stationed.

Nine long, weary months was I a prisoner in the little attic room, never going out, never seeing any one but Holroyd and his sister. Only hearing tidings of Gladys or Jack through the personal column of the daily papers. Letters were out of the question, for detectives were continually on the alert and large rewards were offered for my apprehension.

I can never forget the kindness of Millicent and Angus Holroyd, who tended me unceasingly. Often I was capricious and unthankful, growing weary of my imprisonment.

Hot summer days passed drearily on and winter came round again. The glistening snow lay thickly upon my attic roof. How I longed for a sight of Gladys and the dear old Irvineside homestead. I was beginning to wish for death rather than this banishment, perhaps a whole life-time of cruel imprisonment and wrong.

It was the day before Christmas Eve. Never in my whole life did I feel so despondingly and wretched. The daily papers had brought me the sad news of Clifford Fairfax's death upon the battle plain, cruelly shot down by the enemy, whilst ministering to the dying around him. Ah! Egyptian sod never yet covered a braver, nobler heart than that of Clifford Fairfax.

No human being ever felt more wretched than I that morning. At mid-day Holroyd came to my room. I read in his face that all was hopeless. He had no need to tell me that the human blood-hounds were upon the right track at last and my capture might be at any moment.

Left alone my very senses seemed to grow dull and numbed awakening afterwards to a frenzy almost bordering upon madness.

I heard loud voices, then footsteps ascending the stairs to my room. My brain seemed upon fire. I felt that I was rapidly losing my reason. "They shall never take me alive," I groaned in my madness and—oh, coward that I was—I sprang across the room and snatched up a razor lying upon the bureau.

One more second all would have been over but the razor was dashed from my hand. Not, however, by the detectives whom in imagination I already beheld, but by Jack Irvine armed with a proclamation just issued by the Governor General for the immediate pardon of Oliver Brandon.

Gervase Larhue was dying and had confessed to the murder of his old master, had made a deposition to the effect that he himself, disguised like his master, had journeyed from Montreal to Toronto from where he had taken my pistol with which he devilishly planned to lay a fearful crime upon me. Further confessing to having hidden the Indian clasp in the lining of my pocket book and to having placed the opal ring in between the leathern cover of my valise while I lay asleep at my Uncle's house at Montreal.

The happy Christmas bells were ringing their joyful blessing of "Peace on earth," from many a church tower as Jack and I that evening drove from Guelph through beautiful romantic Elora to Irvineside. The tamaracs and maple trees stood boldly out in the bright moonlight as we neared home.

The dear old Irvineside homestead, after my long and wretched absence, looked most divinely lovely to me in its peaceful, winter snow-dress. The icicles hung in lengthy fringes from the quaintly carved and gabled porch, where Gladys, regardless of the cold, north wind was waiting to welcome me. As I clasped her close, close to my happy throbbing heart, I asked, "My darling, you believed and trusted in me always; but suppose you had thought me guilty of that awful deed. You would have left me then, my Gladys?'

And as she nestled in my arms she whispered "Oliver, my dearest, I have never doubted you for one moment, to do so would have broken my heart for I should still have loved you the same through good and ill."

[THE END]

Wilful Cupid.

Caroline, the eldest and perhaps the most beautiful of the daughters of the Duke Maximilian in Bavaria, was, while still a child, selected as a fitting bride for the heir of the Austrian crown, and although there was no formal betrothal her father was informed that she must be educated in such a way as would fit her for her future grandeur. This was more easily said than done, for money was scarce in the ducal palace; but the whole family, from the duke himself to the youngest child, seem to have thrown themselves con amore into the work, and to have cheerfuly economized for the sake of the fortunate Caroline. She had professors and teachers of the best, and she well repaid all the care that was lavished upon her, for at 19, clever, accomplished, and regally beautiful, she was the very ideal of what a queen should be.

When the time for the marriage drew near the young Emperor Joseph came on a visit to the Duke in Bavaria (the family title is "in," not "of," that he might make the acquaintance of his future wife. He gazed at the stately creature who had been so carefully trained for him with respectful admiration, but he fell violently in love with her madcap younger sister Elizabeth, who, regarded in the family as a mere child, and one, too, for whom no high destiny was in store, had been allowed to pass her days on horseback scouring the country side. Ministers and courtiers stood aghast, but argument and persuasion were alike wasted on the Emperor, who refused to see that a lack of accomplishments was a blemish in the one whom he loved, and a few months later Elizabeth, thorough child as she was, knowing no more of the etiquette of courts than the veriest little gamin, entered Vienna in state as Empress of Austria and Queen of Hungary.

Although this happened more than thirty years ago she has not yet learned to submit with patience to the restraints that hedge in the lives of sovereigns, and the Viennese, in spite of their love for their beautiful Em-

Lord Salisbury's Unfortunate Gibe—India Excited—The Suakin Trouble A Diplomatic Victory.

It will not be surprising if the most important event in the week's history proves to be the stray, half-humorous, and inadvertent remark in Lord Salisbury's speech at Edinburgh. He was speaking of the recent Holborn by-election, and contemptuously referred to the Liberal candidate in that division in 1886 as a 'black man.' It happens that the gentleman referred to, the Hon. Dadabhai Naoroji, is a wealthy and learned Parsee, who has been prominent in India politics and public life for a long time. He was president of the recent Indian National Congress, and is the most distinguished and cultivated of all the native gentlemen who have yet come to England to reside. This foolish reference has created great excitement throughout India, and even the Government organs among the anglo-Indian press are driven to characterize it as an inexplicable and incredible blunder. Many cabled demands for an explanation and a contradiction have already come from Bombay. The vast Indian Empire was convulsed with a terrible war only thirty years ago over a mere question involving greased cartridges. Since that time there have been educational advancements in India not equaled in any other part of the globe, and of late the existence of a large class of astute and devoted native politicians, who adopt a critical attitude toward the English rule, has made the problem of governing India increasingly difficult and delicate. Lord Salisbury's gibe will do more mischief throughout India than Lord Lansdowne will be able to repair during his whole term as Viceroy, and those here who know the country best say it is the most unfortunate thing that has happened to England in a generation.

Everybody is talking about the coming battle outside of Suakin. Apparently it is certain to be fought very soon and equally certain that it will be a hot and desperate fight, with heavy losses and an entirely problematical result. In either event the next session of Parliament will have to face the necessity of a Soudan expedition unless it is prepared to abandon the Red Sea littoral altogether, for this approaching conflict can be decisive of nothing. If the garrison are defeated and badly handled in their sortie, of course England will be committed to immediate operations. If, on the other hand, Osman Digma is driven out of his trenches he will simply retire to the foothills, where the enemy cannot follow him, and gather his energies for a renewal of the siege at his leisure.

England has just scored a diplomatic victory, which changes the complexion of the whole Central Asian question. Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, whose mission to Persia was bitterly attacked by the Liberals as a sinecure and a partisan job, has succeeded in getting Persia to give a lot of valuable

A DESPERADO DOGGED.

And Finally Captured by two Daring Detectives.

A despatch from West Virginia to the New York Herald gives the following account of the capture of another member of the notorious Hatfield gang of murderers.

Another of the murderous Hatfield gang has been dragged in manacles from the rough mountains, where the desperadoes have so long defied the law and slaughtered as they chose.

The bloody border war that has strewn the shores of the Tug River with graves is being rapidly brought to a close by the iron nerved detectives who are prowling through the great wilderness to which law has so long been a stranger.

It takes a man with a lion's heart to go into the strongholds of the Hatfields now. Every trail over the mountains or along the creeks leading to the Hatfield settlement is picketed by ambushed murderers, who would kill without mercy any man they suspected. These detectives are going through experiences such as one reads of in dime novels. It seems hard for a man who hears their tales to believe that such things can be in a civilized land.

Ellison Hatfield, alias Mounts, the brute who was captured after a desperate struggle in the mountains with Detectives Gibson and Cunningham about three weeks ago, made a full confession. He implicated Alexander Messer as one of the slayers of the McCoy boys, who were shot to death in August five years ago by a merciless tribunal of the woods headed by "Devil Ance" Hatfield.

Messer is known as one of the most desperate ruffians on the border and was a conspicuous figure in Breathitt county trouble in Kentucky a few years ago. It is said that he killed five or six men in that county and boasted that he had killed twenty-six men since the war.

So frightful were the deeds of this man that he was feared even by the Hatfields, to whom the shedding of blood is commonplace. Governor Buckner, of Kentucky, offered a reward of $350 for Messer's body, and Gibson and Cunningham have been on his track night and day since they captured Ellison Hatfield. As he had left the Hatfield settlement soon after the murder of the McCoy boys, fearing the vengeance that Kentucky would wreak, the two detectives found it hard to locate him. It is worth a man's life to ask too many questions or to pry around too much in the region where they had to go.

Finally they struck the desperado's trail and learned that he was living in a log hut, on Ugly Creek, in Lincoln county. On last Wednesday they met a man in Chapman's store in that neighborhood who answered to Messer's description. Fearing to make a mistake, the detectives manœuvred. After a short talk with them the man invited them to his cabin. The detectives accompanied him, and when in his home he mentioned his name. Gibson at once whipped out his revolver and covered the assassin. In another moment Messer was handcuffed. His fury was beyond description.

The captured murderer was brought to this city and taken from here to Catlettsburg, Ky., where he is now in jail. He is about fifty-one years old and has a wife and six children. He was formerly a deputy sheriff in Perry county, Ky. Messer declares that he would never have surrendered and would not have been captured only that the detectives got between him and his gun. He admits having lived with the Hatfields at the time of the murder of the McCoy boys, but denies that he killed either of them. He is the seventh of the Hatfield-McCoy murderers arrested by the detectives.

Although this happened more than thirty years ago she has not yet learned to submit with patience to the restraints that hedge in the lives of sovereigns, and the Viennese, in spite of their love for their beautiful Empress, openly mourn that the Emperor should have chosen one who regards a court ball as a penance and a state ceremony as a thing scarcely to be lived through. From the day of her marriage it seems to have been a constant endeavour to shake off the fetters of her station, and perhaps the happiest hours of her life are those which, while following the hounds of England, or hunting the chamois in her native land, she is able to forget that she is Empress Queen. For her age the Empress Elizabeth is the youngest looking woman in Europe. When one sees her slight, graceful form, eyes brilliant with life and vigour, and complexion that flushes with passing emotions, it seems absurd that she should be the grandmother of big boys and girls.

Caroline, the forsaken one, seems to have met her fate with true royal equanimity. Perhaps she thought that, as her sister gained what she lost it did not really matter. If one may judge by her face, her life has not been a happy one. When she was about 24 she was married to the Prince of Thurm and Taxis, who died some nine years later.

The Game Dinner.

The annual game dinner at the Grand Pacific Hotel, given by Drake, Parker & Co., the proprietors, to their friends is one of the events for November in Chicago. Great preparations are made and the thirty-third of the series, which took place last Saturday evening, was equal, if not superior, to any preceding one. Mr. John B. Drake gave his first game dinner in 1855 at the old Tremont House, on Dearborn St., and each succeeding year he has endeavored to furnish new attractions. The last one certainly was in some respects in advance of any in the long list in the years gone by. On this occasion John B. Drake and Samuel W. Parker were the hosts and the provision made was most elaborate and ample. The variety of game will be noticed from the menu as follows: Leg of mountain sheep, deer tongue, black tail deer, mountain sheep, saddle of antelope, loin of venison, loin of elk, opossum, coon, black bear, wild goose, sand hill crane, ruffled grouse, mallard duck, Virginia partridge, red head duck, sage hen, brant, wood duck, jack rabbit, squirrel, butterball duck, prairie chicken, blue-winged teal, wild turkey, widgeon, pheasant, plover, quail, venison steak, fox squirrel, black birds, snipe, reed birds, red-wing starling, marsh birds, English hare. Ornamental Dishes.—Pyramid of game en Bellevue, aspic of birds a la royal, pattie of liver sur socle, boned quail in plumage, red-wing starling au natural. The special ornaments were the bare back rider and the hunter's mishap.

It is a healthy sign of the times that the working classes in Europe are commencing to protest against the enormous burdens imposed upon them to maintain the armed hosts that have been gathered together under the pretence of preserving the peace. The condemnation of the triple alliance by the workingmen of Milan may be taken as an indication that in the not remote future there will be a general and concerted revolt on the part of the working classes of the Continent against the waste of labour and money upon military preparations for war. If the European governments can be forced to disband their armies and agree to a system of international arbitration for the settlement of disputes, a very important step will have been taken towards the bringing about of the millennium.

the whole Central Asian question. Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, whose mission to Persia was bitterly attacked by the Liberals as a sinecure and a partisan job, has succeeded in getting Persia to give a lot of valuable trading privileges to the English and to commercially boycott the Russians. The importance of this will be recognized when it is remembered that Persia is the real game at which the Russians have been aiming through all their feints on the Afghan frontier. The Russian papers have gone into a frenzy of rage at this untoward development, and are talking more excitedly against England than they have done before since the Penjdeh incident. Official dispatches from St. Petersburg to day recognize that the old Anglo Russian difficulty is reopened in a new and threatening direction, and deplore the fact in language which is taken to mean that Germany will seize the opportunity to disarm France and make herself master of Europe.

May Women Propose?

Bill Nye writes the following letter on the subject:—

"I do not see why woman should not propose if she so elect, and then suffer the bitter, bitter consequence. Many men who now live on unloved and in a hand-to-mouth manner might be, oh, so happy! if the onus of popping did not weigh them down like a large three-cornered incubus.

"I am acquainted with several husbands who have been thus acquired, and I am happy to say they are turning out well. Several of them who were not self-supporting to start with have married well, having been wooed and won by girls of means.

Yours truly, BILL NYE.

"P. S.—I am provided for myself.

"P. S. Again—Mr. James Whitcomb Riley, who, as I write, is brushing his hair with a dummy brush which I carry with me, says he trusts that the day will speedily come when woman will propose, and he hopes he will be away up towards the general-delivery window when the office opens. Some good woman could make Mr. Riley very, very happy. Any letters sent to him in my care will be cheerfully read and forwarded to him. B. N."

If Mr. Nye's letter does not encourage some girl who thinks "bitter, bitter consequence" is not any bitterer because of her doing the proposing to utilise her very short time to receive an engagement ring for a Christmas present, I can't see what will. Mr. Nye's marriage certificate seems to hover around his first "P. S." like bumblebees around clover, but there is a chance for some good woman with Mr. Riley. For those who have not seen him I can vouch for him. He is a handsome and a genial gentleman.—NELLIE BLY, in N. Y. World.

A Candid Confession.

"Well, farmer, how are the crops?"

"Very good.

"You don't kick about anything then?"

"No."

"Then what are you looking so blue about?"

"Because I don't know of anything that I can complain of."

Railroad engineers are subject to a peculiar nervous disease brought about by continuous shocks.

A Western medium has interviewed Adam on the question, "Is marriage a failure?" "I don't exactly say that marriage is a failure," remarked the materialised first man, as he sat down on a materialized log just outside of the Garden of Eden, and looked hungrily at the fruit on the other side of the wall, "but if I had remained single this wouldn't have happened."

tives got between him and his gun. He admits having lived with the Hatfields at the time of the murder of the McCoy boys, but denies that he killed either of them. He is the seventh of the Hatfield-McCoy murderers arrested by the detectives.

Gibson, who made the arrest, is the youngest member of the force, but one of the most fearless detectives in the United States. Single-handed he went into the McCoy settlement and captured two of the McCoy gang, brought them to this State and received the reward offered for them. In company with other detectives about two weeks ago he made a raid on the Hatfields, capturing one and shooting the forefinger off Tom Chambers' hand, also shooting him through the side. On that trip Gibson lay in the woods three days without any thing to eat except what chestnuts he could find among the leaves.

Cheesine.—A Yankee Product.

A new name has been coined for an American substance which has been for a long time on the American and British markets and which is alleged to be eatable. It is now called "cheesine," indicating that it is first cousin to those disreputable counterfeits, "butterine" and "oleomargarine." "Cheesine" is doubtless cheese made from milk the natural fat of which has been extracted at the butter factory. To the skim milk cheese any very cheap animal fat is added. The product is sometimes called "lard cheese." The combination of words is quite as insulting to the hog as it is to the cow. Of course anybody who wants to eat a combination of skim milk and the fat from "died' animals is at liberty to do so, but Legislatures everywhere should step in and compel all such commodities to be sold under their correct descriptions. In Canada we have not yet arrived at "cheesine," and in the interest of our immense dairy export business it is desirable that the Dominion Government should prohibit the manufacture of the stuff unless it can be absolutely prevented from going upon the market under a false name.

A Modern Hercules.

Charles H. Sampson, a New York strong man, engaged to slay a steer with his fist. The feat was performed with a single blow in the presence of Emperor Wilhelm and Emperor Francis Joseph. He wears a handsome decoration commemorating that event. This feat of skill and strength was repeated at Ems, Germany, St. Petersburg, and Paris, Mr. Sampson striking but a single blow upon each of the occasions except the last. In this case the steer was running, and his aim was not true, but the first blow knocked the animal down and a second crushed its skull. During his professional experience this Hercules has suffered broken arms no less than seventeen times. He does not attribute his great strength to any freak of nature, but says it is the result of careful training and exercise.

All Skipped.

Senior partner (to office boy)—"What makes the cashier so late this morning?"

"He's taken all the cash and gone to Montreal, sir."

"Where's the clerk?"

"He's skipped to Spain with all the silverware, sir."

"Well, where's my partner?"

"Gone to Europe with all the gold watches, sir."

"Good Heavens! Well, see here! as long as all the rest have gone, I'll take the diamonds and visit South America; and, by the way, you can take that basket there, fill it with nickel watches and cross over to Jersey."

"ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH."

CHAPTER XV.—CONTINUED.

"I saw the skeleton forms of half-a-dozen more of them slinking among the bushes that skirted a low island; and tired and cold, I gave myself and the oxen up for lost, when I felt the ice tremble on which I stood, and heard men running at a little distance. 'Fire your guns?' I cried out, as loud as I could. My order was obeyed, and such a yelling and howling immediately filled the whole forest as would have chilled your very heart. The thievish varmints instantly fled away into the bush.

"I never felt the least fear of wolves until that night; but when they meet in large bands, like cowardly dogs, they trust to their numbers and grow fierce. If you meet with one wolf, you may be certain that the whole pack is at no great distance."

We were fast approaching Sandy Point, a long white ridge of sand, running half across the lake, and though only covered with scattered groups of scrubby trees and brush, it effectually screened Stony Lake from our view. There were so many beautiful flowers peeping through the dwarf, green bushes, that, wishing to inspect them nearer, Mat kindly ran the canoe ashore, and told me that he would show me a pretty spot, where an Indian, who had been drowned during a storm off that point, was buried. I immediately recalled the story of Susan Moore's father, but Mat thought that he was interred upon one of the islands farther up.

"It is strange," he said, "that they are such bad swimmers. The Indian, though unrivalled by us whites in the use of the paddle, is an animal that does not take readily to the water, and those among them who can swim seldom use it as a recreation."

Pushing our way through the bushes, we came to a small opening in the underwood, so thickly grown over with wild Canadian roses, in full blossom, that the air was impregnated with a delightful odour. In the centre of this bed of sweets rose the humble mound that protected the bones of the red man from the ravenous jaws of the wolf and the wild cat. It was completely covered with stones, and from among the crevices had sprung a tuft of blue harebells, waving as wild and free as if they grew among the bonny heather on the glorious hills of the North or shook their tiny bells to the breeze on the broom encircled commons of England.

The harebells had always from a child been with me a favorite flower; and the first sight of it in Canada, growing upon that lonely grave, so flooded my soul with remembrances of the past that in spite of myself the tears poured freely from my eyes. There are moments when it is impossible to repress those outgushings of the heart—

"Those flood-gates of the soul that sever,
In passion's tide to part for ever."

If Mat and his sister wondered at my tears, they must have suspected the cause, for they walked to a little distance, and left me to the indulgence of my feelings. I gathered those flowers and placed them in my bosom, and kept them for many a day; they had become holy, when connected with sacred home recollections, and the never-dying affection of the heart which the sight of them recalled.

A shout from our companions in the other canoe made us retrace our steps to the shore. They had already rounded the point, and were wondering at our absence.

Oh, what a magnificent scene of wild and lonely grandeur burst upon us as we swept round the little peninsula, and the whole majesty of Stony Lake broke upon us at Hill," from the abundance of oak-trees which clothed its steep sides. The wood of this oak is so heavy and hard that it will not float in the water, and it is in great request for the runners of lumber sleighs, which have to pass over very bad roads.

The breeze, which had rendered our sail up the lakes so expeditious and refreshing, had stiffened into a pretty high wind, which was dead against us all the way down. Betty now knelt in the bow and assisted her brother, squaw fashion in paddling the canoe; but in spite of all, their united exertions, it was past ten o'clock before we reached the mill. The good Norah was waiting tea for us. She had given the children their supper four hours ago, and the little creatures, tired with using their feet all day, were sound asleep upon her bed.

After supper, several Irish songs were sung, while Pat played upon the fiddle, and Betty and Mat enlivened the company with an Irish jig.

It was midnight when the children were placed on my cloak at the bottom of the canoe, and we bade adieu to this hospitable family. The wind being dead against us, we were obliged to dispense with the sail, and take to our paddles. The moonlight was as bright as day, and the air warm and balmy; and the aromatic, resinous smell exuded by the heat from the balm-of-giliead and the pine-trees of the forest added greatly to our sense of enjoyment as we floated past scenes so wild and lonely—isles that assumed a mysterious look and character in that witching hour. In moments like these I ceased to regret my separation from my native land; and, filled with the love of Nature, my heart forgot for the time the love of home. The very spirit of peace seemed to brood over the waters, which were broken into a thousand ripples of light by every breeze that stirred the rice blossoms, or whispered through the shivering aspen-trees. The far-off roar of the rapids, softened by distance, and the long, mournful cry of the night-owl alone broke the silence of the night. Amid these lonely wilds the soul draws nearer to God, and is filled to overflowing by the overwhemling sense of His presence.

It was two o'clock in the morning when we fastened the canoe to the landing, and Moodie carried up the children to the house. I found the girl still up with my boy, who had been very restless during our absence. My heart reproached me as I caught him to my breast, for leaving him so long; in a few minutes he was consoled for past sorrows, and sweetly sleeping in my arms.

A CANADIAN SONG.

Come, launch the light canoe;
The breeze is fresh and strong:
The summer skies are blue,
And 'tis joy to float along;
Away o'er the waters,
The bright-glancing waters,
The many-voiced waters,
As they dance in light and song.

When the great Creator spoke,
On the long unmeasured night,
The living day-spring broke,
And the waters own'd His might;
The voice of many waters,
Of glad, rejoicing waters,
Of living, leaping waters,
First hailed the dawn of light.

Where foaming billows glide
To earth's remotest bound;
The rushing ocean tide
Rolls on the solemn sound:

laying light pieces of round timber across the trunks of the trees, and setting fire to them at the point of contact, by which means the trees are slowly burned through.

It was while busily engaged in this interesting operation that I first became acquainted with the subject of this sketch.

Some twenty or thirty little fires were burning briskly in different parts of the blackened field, and the old fellow was watching the slow progress of his silent "niggers," and replacing them from time to time as they smouldered away. After threading my way among the uncouth logs, blazing and smoking in all directions, I encountered the old man, attired in an old bonnet, or hood, of his wife Judy, with his patched canvas trousers rolled up to his knees; one foot bare, and the other furnished with an old boot, which from its appearance had once belonged to some more aristocratic foot. His person was long, straight and sinewy, and there was a light springiness and elasticity in his step which would have suited a younger man, as he skipped along with a long handspike over his shoulder. He was singing a stave from the "Enniskillen Dragoon" when I came up with him.

"With his silver mounted pistols, and his long carbine, Long life to the brave Inniskillen dragoon,"

His face would have been one of the most lugubrious imaginable, with his long, tangled hair hanging confusedly over it, in a manner which has been happily compared to a "bewitched haystack," had it not been for a certain humorous twitch or convulsive movement, which affected one side of his countenance, whenever any droll idea passed through his mind. It was with a twitch of this kind, and a certain indescribable twinkle of his somewhat melancholy eye, as he seemed intuitively to form a hasty conception of the oddity of his appearance to a stranger unused to the bush, that he welcomed me to his clearing. He instantly threw down his handspike, and leaving his "niggers" to finish their work at their leisure, insisted on our going to his house to get something to drink.

On the way, I explained to him the object of my visit, which was to mark out, or "blaze", the side-lines of a lot of land I had received as part of a military grant, immediately adjoining the beaver-meadow, and I asked him to accompany me, as he was well acquainted with the different lots.

"Och! by all manner of manes, and welcome; the dhevil a foot of the way but I know as well as my own clearing; but come into the house, and get a dhrink of milk, an' a bite of bread an' butther, for sorrow a dhrop of the whiskey has crossed my teeth for the last month; an' it's but poor intertainment for man or baste I can offer you, but shure you're heartily welcome."

The precincts of the homestead were divided into an infinity of enclosures, of all shapes and sizes. The outer enclosure was a bush fence, formed of trees felled on each other in a row, and the gaps filled up with brushwood. There was a large gate swung with wooden hinges, and a wooden latch to fasten it; the smaller enclosures were made with round poles, tied together with bark. The house was of the rudest description of "shanty," with hollowed basswood logs, fitting into each other somewhat in the manner of tiles for a roof, instead of shingles. No iron was to be seen, in the absence of which there were plenty of leathern hinges, wooden latches for locks and bark-strings instead of nails. There was a large fire-place at one end of the shanty, with a chimney, constructed of split laths, plastered with a mixture of clay and cowdung. As for windows, these were luxuries that could well be dispensed with; the open door was an were wondering at our absence.

Oh, what a magnificent scene of wild and lonely grandeur burst upon us as we swept round the little peninsula, and the whole majesty of Stony Lake broke upon us at once, another Lake of the Thousand Isles in miniature, and in the heart of the wilderness! Imagine a large sheet of water, some fifteen miles in breadth and twenty-five in length, taken up by islands of every size and shape, from the lofty naked rock of red granite to the rounded hill, covered with oak-trees to its summit; while others were level with the waters, and of a rich emerald green, only fringed with a growth of aquatic shrubs and flowers. Never did my eyes rest on a more lovely or beautiful scene. Not a vestige of man, or of his works was there. The setting sun, that cast such a gorgeous flood of light upon this exquisite panorama, bringing out some of these lofty islands in strong relief, and casting others into intense shade, shed no cheery beam upon church spire or cottage pane. We beheld the landscape, savage and grand in its primeval beauty.

As we floated among the channels between these rocky picturesque isles, I asked Mat how many of them there were.

"I never could succeed," he said, "in counting them all. One Sunday, Pat and I spent a whole day in going from one to the other, to try and make out how many there were, but we could only count up to one hundred and forty before we gave up the task in despair. There are a great many of them; more than any one would think—and, what is very singular, the channel between them is very deep, sometimes above forty feet, which accounts for the few rapids to be found in this lake. It is a glorious place for hunting; and the waters, undisturbed by steam-boats, abound in all sorts of fish.

"Most of these islands are covered with huckleberries; while grapes, high and low bushed cranberries, blackberries, wild cherries, gooseberries, and several other sorts of wild currants grow here in profusion. There is one island among these groups (but I never could light upon the identical one) where the Indians yearly gather their wampum-grass. They come here to collect the best birch-bark for their canoes and to gather wild onions. In short, from the game, fish and fruit which they collect among the islands of this lake, they chiefly depend for their subsistence. They are very jealous of the white settlers in the country coming to hunt and fish here, and tell many stories of wild beasts and rattlesnakes that abound along its shores; but I, who have frequented the lake for years, was never disturbed by anything, beyond the adventure with the wolf, which I have already told you. The banks of this lake are all steep and rocky, and the land along the shore is barren, and totally unfit for cultivation.

"Had we time to run up a few miles further, I could have showed you some places well worth a journey to look at but the sun is already down, and it will be dark before we get back to the mill."

The other canoe now floated alongside, and Pat agreed with his brother that it was high time to return. With reluctance I turned from this strangely fascinating scene. As we passed under one bold rocky Island, Mat, said, laughingly, "That is Mount Rascal."

"How did it obtain that name?"

"Oh, we were out here berrying, with our good priest, Mr. B———. This island promised so fair, that we landed upon it, and, after searching for an hour, we returned to the boat without a single berry, upon which Mr. B———named it 'Mount Rascal.'"

The island was so beautiful, it did not deserve the name, and I christened it "Oak

CHAPTER XVI.—The "Ould Dhragoon."

It is delightful to observe a feeling of contentment under adverse circumstances. We may smile at the rude and clumsy attempts of the remote and isolated backwoodsman to attain something like comfort, but happy he who, with the bouyant spirits of the light-hearted Irishman, dontrives to make himself happy even while all others would be miserable.

A certain degree of dissatisfaction with our present circumstances is necessary to stimulate us to exertion, and thus enable us to secure future comfort; but where the delusive prospect of future happiness is too remote for any reasonable hope of ultimate attainment, then surely it is true wisdom to make the most of the present and to cultivate the spirit of happy contentment with the lot assigned to us by Providence.

"Ould Simpson," or the "Ould Dhragoon," as he was generally called, was a good sample of this happy character; and I shall proceed to give the reader a sketch of his history, and a description of his establishment. He was one of that unfortunate class of discharged soldiers who are tempted to sell their pensions often far below their true value, for the sake of getting a lot of land in some remote settlement, where it is only rendered valuable by the labour of the settler, and where they will have the unenviable privilege of expending the last remains of their strength in clearing a patch of land for the benefit of some grasping storekeeper who has given them credit while engaged in the work.

The old dragoon had fixed his abode on the verge of an extensive beaver meadow, which was considered a sort of natural curiosity in the neighborhood; and where he managed by cutting the rank grass in the summer time, to support several cows, which afforded the chief subsistence of his family. He had also managed, with the assistance of his devoted partner, Judy, to clear a few acres of poor rocky land on the sloping margin of the level meadow, which he planted year after year with potatoes. Scattered over this small clearing, here and there, might be seen the but-end of some half-burnt hemlock tree, which had escaped the general combustion of the log heaps, and now formed a striking contrast to the white limestone rocks which showed their rounded surfaces above the meagre soil.

The "ould dhragoon" seemed, moreover, to have some taste for the picturesque, and by the way of ornament, had left standing sundry tall pines and hemlocks neatly girdled to destroy their foliage, the shade of which would have been detrimental to the "blessed praties" which he deigned to grow in his clearing, but which, in the meantime, like martyrs at the stake, stretched their naked branches imploringly towards the heavens. As he was a kind of hermit, from choice, and far removed from other settlers, whose assistance is so necessary in new settlements, old Simpson was compelled to resort to the most extraordinary contrivances while clearing his land. Thus, after felling the trees, instead of chopping them into lengths, for the purpose of facilitating the operation of piling them preparatory to burning, which would have cost him too much labor, he resorted to the practice of "niggering," as it is called; which is simply at one end of the shanty, with a chimney, constructed of split laths, plastered with a mixture of clay and cowdung. As for windows, these were luxuries that could well be dispensed with; the open door was an excellent substitute for them in the daytime, and at night none were required. When I ventured to object to this arrangement, that he would have to keep the door shut in the winter time, the old man replied, in the style so characteristic of his country, "Shure it will be time enough to think of that when the could weather sets in." Everything about the house wore a Robinson Crusoe aspect, and though there was not any appearance of original plan or foresight, there was no lack of ingenious contrivance to meet every want as it arose.

Judy dropped us a low curtsey as we entered, which was followed by a similar compliment from a stout girl of twelve, and two or three more of the children, who all seemed to share the pleasure of their parents in receiving strangers in their unpretending tenement. Many were the apologies that poor Judy offered for the homely cheer she furnished us, and great was her delight at the notice we took of the "childher." She set little Biddy, who was the pride of her heart to reading the Bible; and she took down a curious machine from a shelf, which she had "conthrived out of her own head," as she said, for teaching the children to read. This was a flat box, or frame, filled with sand, which saved paper, pens, and ink. Poor Judy had evidently seen better days, but, with a humble and contented spirit, she blessed God for the food and scanty raiment their labor afforded them. Her only sorrow was the want of "idication" for the childrin.

She would have told us a long story about her trials and sufferings, before they had attained their present comparative comfort and independence, but, as we had a tedious scramble before us, through cedar-swamps, beaver-meadows, and the piny ridges, the "ould dragoon" cut her short, and we straightway started on our toilsome journey.

Simpson, in spite of a certain dash of melancholy in his composition, was one of those happy fellows of the "light heart and thin pair of breeches" school who, when they meet with difficulty or misfortune, never stop to measure its dimensions, but hold in their breath and run lightly over, as in crossing a bog, where to stand still is to sink.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Fearfully and Wonderfully Made.

Avoid quotations, unless you are well studied in their import and feel their pertinence. A man the other day, while looking at the skeleton of an ass which had been dug out of a sandpit, and admiring and wondering at the structure of that despised animal, made a very mal-adroit use of one. "Ah!" said he, with the deepest humanity, and a simplicity worthy of La Fontaine, "we are fearfully and wonderfully made!"

The turkeys and chickens are beginning to roost high and far off.

The Prince of Wales was so delighted with the Hungarian national dance (the "Csardas") that he has made arrangements to introduce it to English society. It will be a feature at the fashionable London balls this season.

Several glass factories now cut the large cylinders of window glass by encircling the cylinder with a fine wire, which is then heated to redness by an electric current, and a drop of water being allowed to fall upon the hot glass, a perfectly clean cut is obtained. The old method was to draw out a fibre of white hot semi molten glass from the furnace by means of tongs, and to wrap it round the cylinder.

MISCELLANEOUS.

So-called "revolutions" in industry, consequent upon discovery and invention, follow one another so quickly in these days that we have well nigh lost the faculty of wonder, as "revolution" succeeds "revolution" with bewildering rapidity. One of the latest is said to be an approaching "revolution" in telegraphy owing to the alleged discovery by a Spanish savant of a method of sending despatches without the use of batteries. Preliminary tests in the presence of expert witnesses are said to have proved thoroughly successful.

We congratulate Mr. O'Connor very heartily on his victory over Teemer. It is something for Torontonians to be proud about, that in this young Irish Canadian they have a champion who seems so likely to prove himself a worthy successor of Hanlan, who may now be set down as out of the race. His day is done, and he must be content to yield the pas to younger men. He need not be jealous, however, as he has a brilliant record of victory on which to look back and content himself in the hour of his decrease. We trust that O'Connor will always show himself worthy of the respect as well as the admiration of the people of Toronto.

The recently formed plan of putting down the East African Slave Trade promises to be successful. It is to take the form of a strict blockade of the coast by the English and German fleets assisted so far by the French. By this arrangement it is expected that the imports necessary for carrying on the slave trade will be stopped and at the same time that there will be no outlet, and consequently no market for the slaves brought down to the coast. By this plan, combined with the encouragement of legitimate trade, it is very naturally expected that, as in the case of the West African slave trade, this accursed business along the Eastern shores of the continent will within a comparatively short time be altogether destroyed.

For years past the world has been watching with anxiety and protesting against the growth of European armaments, and the increase of the burden of taxation necessary for the maintenance thereof; yet the process still goes on. To-day Russia is seeking to borrow $100,000 000 for the purpose of keeping up her display of strength; Germany wants $60,000,000 in order to increase the size of her fleet; and England is seriously thinking of expending $50 000 000 in the same manner. What is all this to end in? If not war at an early period, with its frightful cost and its attendant horrors, is there not a danger that the over-burdened people may be driven to revolt against the tyranny and oppression of the system of militarism which is slowly grinding them into the dust?

As everybody who knew anything about the matter fully expected, the researches of the Mining Commission which the Ontario Government appointed, are confirming the opinion, that as yet the majority of Canadians have very faint conceptions of the mineral wealth of their country. There is iron ore in abundance, perhaps in inexhaustible abundance. There is silver. There is copper. There is marble, too, and much other buried wealth which will make coming generations rich and powerful, meanwhile the present generations seems to stand and gaze like Joshua's moon at Askelon, not knowing what to do about it. Capitalists are timid and will not risk loss in setting up blast furnaces, and giving us oscular demonstration, of what experts say is the fact, that we can manufacture as good iron as any on the continent.

The likelihoods seem to predict that with the present winter three of the most distin-

Saint Nicholas.

Saint Nicholas was the most popular of the saints in the Middle Ages. No other whose name is in the calendar was applied to by more people, or by those who were more unlike in character and circumstances. He was made the patron of the common people, of laborers, of prisoners, of slaves, of travellers, sailors, butchers, robbers, clerks, scholars, and in a very special manner of good girls and of boys. He has been made the patron saint of Russia much in the same way that St. George is the patron of England.

Of the life of this saint nothing is known with certainty. The most trustworthy account says that he was a native of Patara in Lycia. As to the time of his birth it is less confident. The supposed date is in the third century of our era, and his life possibly extended into the fourth century. He is mentioned most frequently as having lived under the reign of Constantine the Great.

Nicholas was Bishop of Myra in Lycia. About six hundred years after his death his body was removed from that place to Bari, on the Southeastern coast of Italy. He had already become famous at the time of this removal, and his reputation for performing miracles continued to grow rapidly.

As a specimen of what was reported to his credit, Sir Richard Torkington, who made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1517, tells the following: "We passed the Isle of Seynt Nicholas, where be tooles made of Iron that never lose their edgge by myracle of Seynt Nicholas; as they say—I saw it nott."

The day which, in the calendar, is dedicated to Saint Nicholas is the 6th of December. It is surprising to find the observance of that day postponed to the Christmas holidays. When the change took place, and how it was brought about, would not be easy to discover at this day. That this observance and our present usage of making presents at Christmas are one and the same practice will be seen from the following account of the custom given by an early English writer:

'From a very early day it has been customary, on the eve of St. Nicholas's Day, for children to put their stockings, shoes, or slippers in the bedrooms of those from whom they expect or desire favors, when, sure enough, next morning their little feet-pieces are replete with sweetmeats, toys, or coins."

The manner of observing St. Nicholas's Eve is described by a poet of two or three hundred years ago at considerable length. Room can be found here for only a few lines:

"Children on the eve do cause to fast;
And when they every one at night in senseless sleep are cast,
Both apples, nuts and pears they bring, and other things beside,
As caps, and shoes, and petticoats, which secretly they hide,
And in the morning found, they say, that this St. Nicholas brought."

This shows that at that time in England presents were made on the eve of the 6th of December instead of at Christmas, as now. In the Greek Church and in the north of Europe, however, schoolboys still invoke the liberality of St. Nicholas or Santa Claus, as he is now commonly called, on that night.

How St. Nicholas could become patron to characters so unlike as robbers and good boys is a matter now difficult to understand. There is a ballad relating to his patronage of boys which is one of the most popular ever written. Its story is as painful as that of the "Babes in the Wood." Strange it is that themes most harrowing are most Notes for Women.

There are twenty-three women inspectors in the New York Custom House. Among them is a sister of Roscoe Conkling. They receive $21 per week.

And yet another American girl is to marry a foreigner and a title. The engagement is announced of Baron Von Schroeder, of the Prussian Imperial Guards, to Miss Pritchard, of Boston.

It is said that the death of Bonanza Banker Flood will give his daughter, Miss Jennie, $50,000,000 and make her the richest young woman in the world. She is fairly well to do now. It is related that one day as she was sitting in her sewing chair, her father dropped $2,500,000 of 4 per cent. U. S. bonds in her lap.

Some distinctive quality has always been associated in the public mind with the lady of the White House. With Mrs. Grant it was interest in national affairs; with Mrs. Hayes, Temperance; with Mrs. Cleveland, beauty, and with Mrs. Harrison it promises to be domesticity. Nearly all the items about her tell of her doing her own marketing and praise her skill as a housekeeper.

A letter from Alabama tells of a girl "who can drive like Jehu, ride and shoot like a cowboy, run like a professional and swim like a duck. She will go rowing with no company but her dog and gun, and she can drop her oars, spring to her feet with her gun and shoot a marsh hen or a grosbeak without rocking the boat or misplacing the oars. She sleeps on pillows of down from birds and ducks killed by her own hand, and expects by next spring to have enough feathers of the same kind to make a feather bed."

Mrs. Harrison is an enthusiastic china painter and showed a correspondent the other day with pride a set of salad and fruit plates carefully painted under the instruction of a skilful Dresden artist now in Indianapolis. Each plate was decorated with the separate ingredients of a salad. One bore a delicate spray of celery, another bore a sliced lemon or a bit of lettuce, another a red tomato cut in half, and so on through the order of pickles, carrots, olives, cucumbers and purple beets. The fruit plates were finely designed with different fruit—currents, gooseberries, plums and grapes. Among other gems were a water color of pansies and a large square tile with chrysanthemums.

Twenty-five years ago the now Princes of Wales and future Queen of England was living on the third floor of a corner house in Copenhagen, and her father, who no one ever dreamed then of being a King, was poorer than many a burgher in the same street. She and her two sisters, now the Czarine of Russia and the Duchess of Cumberland, occupied the same room, scantily furnished, and instead of a wardrobe a curtain drawn across the wall hid the pegs on which their few dresses hung. They had never worn a silk dress in their lives. Now Alexandra doubtless has all the dresses she wants, but it is more than likely that she looks back with pleasure upon those years is the happiest of her life.

Almost any morning about 3 o'clock in Charleston, S.C, a lady who has nerve, not nerves, may be seen going home from her work. She is proofreader for The Charleston World. She comes from a family which is known both for brains and pluck. Her duties take her to the office of the newspaper about 8 o'clock every night and detain her there until 3 the next morning. But she does not rely upon mere courage. She carries a loaded revolver in one hand and a lantern in the other. The police keep a lookout for her goings and comings, and a lookout as she passes their beats. She is a as any on the continent.

The likelihoods seem to predict that with the present winter three of the most distinguished Englishmen of this generation,—or rather perhaps it would be more strictly correct to say of the passing generation—will have passed away. One of these is a famous poet, another is an equally famous Ecclesiastic, known perhaps as widely by his world renowned hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," as by his theological services or opinions, and the third is a not less famous Statesman. One is a large Episcopalian, one an ardent Catholic, and one a conscientious Quaker, All three names, it is safe to say, are carved high on the list of the Immortal. All of them are worthy of memorials in the shrine which England has dedicated to the worship of her God, and the memory of her best and greatest. It is hardly necessary to say that we refer to Lord Tennyson, Cardinal Newman, and Mr. John Bright.

They have a Board of Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners in the State of Minnesota, which, acting under instructions from the State Legislature, has been probing the question of the best method of heating railroad cars, and has reached conclusions which are likely to be embodied in useful legislation during the winter. They unhesitatingly condemn the car stove, an antiquated abomination around which there should by this time have gathered associations of horror enough to banish it henceforth, for all time. It is not by any means a question of having the cars heated by stoves, or not heated at all, for the perfect feasibility of adapting steam heat has already been tried by the Rock Island road, as mentioned last week, among others. May the day soon come when our Canadian roads also will of their own accord free their patrons in this way from fears of roasting. If they do not, some means will have to be found of forcing their hand, with more or less decisiveness.

Amid all the pessimistic outcry about the former timer having been better than these, it is pleasant to notice from the regular official returns that the prison population of Britain is always becoming smaller while the general increase of inhabitants proceeds as usual. In the course of ten years the number of prisoners in England and Wales sank from 20,833 to 14,536 a diminution of 30 per cent. from 1877, to 1887. Another very gratifying fact is that the reduction in the number of female prisoners has been greater than among the males, for while the falling off in the number of men has been only 25.3 per cent. the falling off of the female prisoners has been 41.2 per cent. If a still wider range of view is taken the conclusions to be drawn are still more gratifying. During the last quarter of a century the lowest number of prisoners was in 1852.3. when there was a prison population of 16 700, out of a total population of 18,400,000. This shows that last year, with ten million more people, there were 2000 fewer prisoners than there were thirty-six years ago. It would be well if the same thing could be said of all the countries the world over, and so far this can be said. As a general rule the criminal population is not increasing so rapidly as it used to do.

Results of Mouth Breathing.

Many disease germs enter through an open mouth. The mouth was not made for breathing, but for eating and speaking. The nose was made for breathing, and the air, passing through the long, moist nasal passages, is purified, and leaves behind dust, disease germs and various impurities, while the air is warmed and tempered for the lungs. But when the mouth is left open, dust, dirt and disease rush down into the lungs and, fastening there, develop and destroy the whole system.—[Boston Budget.

ever written. Its story is as painful as that of the "Babes in the Wood." Strange it is that themes most harrowing are most popular.

As to this saint's patronage of robbers, we only know that such was the relation. High waymen were called St. Nicholas's clerks Rowley says, "I think yonder come prancing down the hills, from Kingston a couple of St. Nicholas's clerks's."

Christ's Sympathy for Toilers.

When a man's heart is crushed within him by the galling tyranny of sense; when, from the dawning of the day till the setting of the sun, and for hours beyond it, he is compelled to gather straw for Egypt's bricks, and to bake them in the world's scorching kiln, till the spring of life is dried up within, and he is ready to say, let me but eat and drink and sleep, for there is nothing real but this endless task-work; then, how sweet to say to one's self: "And a cloud received him out of their sight." Yes, just out of sight, but as certainly as if the eye could pierce it, there is a heaven all bright, all pure, all real; there is One there who has my very nature, in it toiled as ceaselessly as the most care-worn and world-lader of us all, having no house, and no leisure so much as to eat. He is there—His warfare accomplished, His life's labour fulfilled: He is there, at rest, yet still working, working for me, bearing me upon his heart, feeling for and feeling with me, in each trial and in each temptation; and not feeling only, but praying too, with that intercession which is not only near but inside God; and not interceding only, but also ministering grace hour by hour, coming into me with the very thought and recollection of good, that exact purpose, and resolution and aspiration, which is needed to keep me brave and to keep me pure.—[Dr. C. J. Vaughan.]

Tussel With a Big Catamount.

While George Hardy and his son, a lad of thirteen, were hunting opossums in the wooded country adjoining Bennett's Mills, Ohio, ther dogs treed what was supposed to be one of the animals they were hunting. Hardy lit a torch and stationed the boy some distance off, and approached the tree to get a shot at the beast, when he was horrified to see the animal springing through the air directly toward his son. It struck the little fellow and bore him to the ground, its claws, clutching in the clothing on his shoulder, tearing away a large chunk of flesh. Mr. Hardy rained heavy blows on its back and head with a club. The catamount left the boy and sprang at the man, its teath fastening in the heavy lapel of his overcoat, which was buttened closely about the neck. It would have seized his throat but for the heavy goods warding off the attack. By this time the dogs had seized the beast and dragged it to the ground, where after a hard battle in which the dogs, Hardy and the boy all joined, it was dispatched. The boy was terribly scratched about the shoulder and left side of the face. The father escaped with the loss of his overcoat and a few deep cuts on his chin and jaw. The catamount measured nearly five feet, and is one of the heaviest animals of its kind ever seen in this section.

His Sore Nose.

"Oh, Mr. De Groom, ain t your nose awful sore?" Mr. De Groom—"Why, no, Etta; what made you think so?" Etta—"Oh, mamma said you had your nose down to the grindstone ever since you were married, an' I thought it must be awful sore by this time."

She carries a loaded revolver in one hand and a lantern in the other. The police keep a lookout for her goings and comings, and a lookout as she passes their beats. She is a maiden lady and the task is unpleasant, but she considers it a duty to work, and what "her hands find to do" she does is with all her might."

Tongue Testers.

The popularity of Peter Piper's celebrated peck of pickled peppers will probably never wane as a snare to catch the tongue that would fain be agile; but that test has formidable rivals. The following short sentences, as their authors maintain, do wonders in baffling the ordinary power of speech:—

Gaze on the gay grav brigade.

The sea ceaseth, and it sufficeth us.

Say, should such a shapely sash shabby stitches show?

Strange strategic statistics.

Give Grimes Jim's gilt gig-whip.

Sarah in a shawl shovelled soft snow softly.

A Story of Lord Westbury.

The London "Athenæum" preserves this story of the late Lord Chancellor Westbury—"In his later life, when he was sitting regularly on the Judical Committee of the Privy Council, he met ex-Chief Justice Erle, and asked him why he did not attend. "For three very good and sufficient reasons," said Sir William Erle: "because I am old, because I am deaf, and because I am stupid.' "Those are not impediments," said Lord Westbury; "—— is very old, —— is very deaf, and—— is very stupid, and yet we four make an excellent court."

Blighted Ambition.

A Redeeming Feature.

Dismal dude—"Life has no charms for me. I sometimes think I wish I were dead."

Miss Blunt—"Well, there is one comfort about suicide. It usually strikes the right person."

Indoor Games for Winter.

As cold weather and our deadly northern winter comes again to shut us up, some indoors and some in the grave, there are games with balls to help drive the destroyer away. All these are good. They bring every muscle into play and especially train the eye, as it follows the flying sphere to and fro, to swift accommodation of vision. Battledore and shuttlecock, played in a cool hall or large room, is next best to tennis, and it is astonishing how much sport may be gained therefrom.

HIS GOOD LUCK.

cause to suspect that I was unhappy. The quiet happiness which shone day after day in her face became a joy to me. It even rebuked me, too. It was plain that she loved me devotedly; and she was so unselfish in her love, so wise, so sensible that I soon found myself admiring her. In the wish to do everything possible for her in order to recompense her for the love I did not have to give her, I thought of trying to remedy her defective hearing. We went to Philadelphia for that purpose. The best aurist in the city made an examination and at once assured us that the trouble was caused by a slight obstruction which would yield readily to simple treatment. In two months Laura returned perfectly cured.

Then I began to notice what a very bright woman my wife was, and she seemed to grow sunnier and sweeter every hour. In less than six months I loved her a thousand times more, it seemed to me, than I had ever loved Alma. When I began to realize I blessed Fate over and over again for giving me my own, even through such incomprehensible ways. "I might have known it," I said to myself. "I always expected to have happiness in my home, and I might have been sure of it, although the light refused to shine for awhile."

At the end of a year I was so infatuated with my lovely little wife that I told her the story of how I came to marry her. That she regarded as the best possible proof of my love for her. Then she confessed to me that she had loved me almost from the hour when she first saw me, but had imagined that I cared for Alma. Yet when I met her on that New Year's morning with such extraordinary cordiality her heart rather than her reason caused the misunderstanding. Yet she declares to this day that what she seemed to hear was, "I love you. Come and let me make you happy all the days of my life." Perhaps my wiser self spoke to her in some silent, heartward way and I knew it not. At all events I am grateful that she thought she heard these words if I didn't say them.

I did not see Alma for five years. Then I wondered how I ever could have loved her. She was still beautiful, of course; but devoted to a life of fashion and show, and was not at all the woman I had imagined she would be. She never knew how she had figured in the romance of my life.

You see, I always expected good luck and always got it, but not always in the way I had expected. After my blundering marriage turned out so well I never doubted my Spanish proverb again. It has never failed me throughout my life, and I will be eighty in December. If I were to preach a sermon to young people every day in the week, I think the concluding sentence would always be: "Expect good luck and you will get it." If I could send a New Year's message to every soul on the earth it would be to expect the good. Put it on your New

"WALKING EGYPT."

A Singular New Year Custom Among the Negroes of the South.

F the old slave customs of the southern states, now that the negroes have been free for nearly a quarter of a century, many are obsolete. The "old sperretuals," as the aged colored Christians call their peculiar hyms, are either given up entirely or modernized and refined till they are barely recognizable. But as the old goes and the new takes its place, we can still see—and it is a "persistence of type" worth the attention of philosophers—that the genius of the original African is still there. The song may be an adaptation from Watts' Hymns; but all the same it is an Africanized Watts.

When a traveler or man of science attends a "colored revival" in the back districts of the gulf states and hears this roaring chorus from one thousand throats—

I see St. Petah a standin' in the do',
Dip in the Golden Sea!
An' all my frien's what went befo',
Dip in the Golden Sea!
O, dip me, bathe me, sistahs, you;
O, brothers, won't you help me through?
We'll all ride behind the milk white steeds—
An' dip in the Golden Sea.

he perceives at once that this is African, not Saxon, imagery. And by the eye of scientific faith he can look back 300 years to the time when the ancestors of these people, under the palm or on the sandy shore, sang and rioted in praise of Bennamucka or Mumbo Jumbo.

The negroes have also had one experience common to all freed people. At first there was a violent reaction against everything that belonged to slave times; they carefully discarded the most trifling customs which might serve to imply a slave origin. By and by, when their freedom was an assured thing and taken as a matter of course, there was a counter reaction; they took up the old songs and customs, but gave them a tone that implied a sense of deliverance. Thus, "Roll, Jordan, roll," became an emancipation song, and "Old Nicodemus" was completely transformed. And by a similar evolution one phase of the old "Juba dance" became "Walking Egypt." This is, in plain English, only a mildly religionized form of the walking dance or dancing walk which the Africans, like all heathen people, have always had. The Indians' "corn dance" and "sun dance" are but variations of the same thing.

But "Walking Egypt," as it now is, dates from emancipation, and is performed on New Year's eve—that is, when they "watch the old year out and the new year in." One description, by a white lady who saw it from the gallery of a Georgia church, is as follows:

"The leader took his place on the floor and began the wild, half barbaric chant; then one by one, as the excitement grew, the others followed. Soon the whole line was in a tremor of excitement, and shouts and improvised lines like these:

Who's dat yondah dressed in black?
Oh, it's an angel dressed in black.

"The walk is by a slight forward jerk of the foot. As the walkers warmed to their work and grew wilder in their movements it was easy to see why the better educated colored people are opposed to the walk; for the men and women took most abandoned attitudes. The scene recalled pictures of the orgies of 'hashish' maddened fanatics. The walk went on for hours, up one aisle and down the

SWEARING OFF.

OR, HOW A NEW LEAF IS SOMETIMES TURNED OVER.

This is the day of all the days, when everybody thinks it pays to overturn a brand new leaf. This is the day when all our grief is heightened by the past year's sin. This is the day when we grow thin reflecting over last year's fun and thinking what we might have done.

Heigh O! I'm sad, now it's too late when I remember '88. Think of the money I have spent. Think of the bills (Great Scott! the rent!) 'Bout all I've done is earn my bread. My boy, you ought to soak your head! What use are you upon this earth? Why, pshaw! I tell you you're not worth the powder that would blow you up. I'm blue today. Well, well, my cup is very full. It makes me mad to think that I have been so bad.

But after all, what is the use? What's done is done. Come, come! a truce. My boy, brace up, 'twill be O.K. a hundred years from yesterday. It does no earthly good to fret. The thing is done, and vain regret won't make it better. Come, don't pine; 'twill be all right in '89. All right? Well, I should faintly smile. You bet; I've done with all past guile.

This raking up of chestnuts old is all played out. The day'll be cold when you observe upon my brow such wrinkles as were there just now. It's just as plain as day to me the reason we unhappy be. My son, it's will power, that is all. Exert it, and Old

Nick will fall. Why, all you've got to do is say "I won't!" By George! it's just as plain as day. Let's see, I'd better make a list, so that nothing will e'er be missed.

No more I'll thrum the gay guitar and wake the neighbors near and far. I'll make no bets, nor will I spring old chestnuts from the circus ring upon my friends, nor will I seek to borrow money on my cheek. I'll wake up in the morning bright, and in the dark I'll strike a light and start the fire while my poor wife in bed is lengthening her life. I'll hustle round and put in coal and saw up wood, upon my soul! I'd better keep a diary, too, to chronicle what I will do. No more tobacco! I have spoke. By Jove! a man's a fool to smoke. And in rethink the concluding sentence would always be: "Expect good luck and you will get it." If I could send a New Year's message to every soul on the earth it would be to expect the good. Put it on your New Year's cards. Write it in your letters. Tell it to the little people. Keep it ever in mind. Believe in it and live by it. The true philosophy of life is in it. "Expect good luck and you will get it."

GERTRUDE GARRISON.

The year is dead! Oh, no! oh, no!
The year still lives! oh, ho! oh, ho!
The rain and wind have ceased, and so
Long life, New Year, to you!
All sounds are hushed, above, below;
Soft on the pane the snow! the snow!
A winding sheet that husheth all
In lowly hut or lordly hall—
A winding sheet for the Old Year—No!
A mantle for the New!

Presentation

The close of school in S. S. No. 17, Ernesttown, was made the occasion of the following presentation and address:

MR. N. A. ASSELSTINE:

Dear Teacher,—We, the scholars who have been permitted to attend the school which has been taught here by you, wish to give some tangible proof of the attachment and regard which we have for you as our teacher by presenting to you this book of poems, written by Mrs. Hemans, which we trust you will accept, and hold with kindly remembrances of us, wherever your future lot may be cast; and always be assured that you have the kind wishes of those who have attended your school in this place.

Signed on behalf of the scholars by

GEORGE ROBSON,
EDNA STORMS,
ETHEL CLARKE.

Mr. Asselstine, in reply, assured them that he would always retain very pleasant memories of his stay of eight and a half years among them as their teacher; and that they should always have a warm place in his affections. He would always feel a keen interest in their future welfare, and be rejoiced at their prosperity, but above all he hoped they should always aim at doing what was right. He assured them that after all this was the one important thing which would secure joys that would outlast the fleeting years of this life. If he should find boys and girls in his next school, as good as those he was leaving, he was certain of a successful career among them.

Mrs. N. Storms then led in singing, "When we all gather home in the morning," and teacher and scholars parted, hoping for many reunions here, and a grand reunion hereafter.

who dropped out exhausted; and at daylight several of the participators were down on their knees, still crawling around the church."

The "Egypt" part of it is an evident reference to the "Walk" of the Israelites out of bondage, for that is a parallel case in the mind of every freedman. But in prosaic fact the "walk" is only one of the thousand ways in which undeveloped people mingle the religious manifestations with the social, the musical and finally the voluptuous. And, of course, as the excitement increases the first element yields to the second and both to the last. In short, the walk is but the survival of some old African fetich worship, and is therefore possible only among the undiluted blacks of the most ignorant class. It is simple matter of truth and justice to add that no freed people in history have ever progressed faster than the negroes; and if they maintain their present rate of development, another generation will see the last of "Walking Egypt."

A Siamese New Year.

All Siamese birthdays are celebrated at New Year's, and at this time the curious custom of "hair cutting" is observed. When a boy reaches the age of 11 or 15, and a girl that of 9 or 13, they are considered no longer children. Up to this time a tuft of hair is allowed to grow just above the forehead, and is always dressed with great care. It is twisted into a graceful knot and held together with a long gold or jeweled pin. At the base of this knot is worn a wreath of fragrant white flowers. The ceremonies of hair cutting often last five or six days. It is the "coming out party" of the boy or girl, and thereafter they are not permitted to mingle with the other sex as children, but are considered to have arrived at a marriageable age.

A Happy New Year! Why not? The path of duty is the path of safety ever, and the separations of the good are for time alone. We are moving in a veritable journey. Our earthboat swims through seas of light sustained by the power that launched it into space.

Have your shrubbery in the front yard boxed up on New Year's day. We once knew a Galveston caller, an otherwise estimable young man, to tumble down the front steps of a lordly mansion and break a valuable tree all to flinders with his head.

No, no, my boy, I've too much sand. What's up? Yes? Well, who'll be there? Only this time. Don't know's I care. Remember then, this once I'll go; but after this no more. No; no. Sillsville.

Miss Hattie Sills is visiting friends in Belleville.

Mr. G. B. Card has moved to his new home at Enterprise.

Mr. Shultz and wife, from Vermont, are visiting their daughter, Mrs. Martin Hough.

The Rev. R. S. Forneri visited a poor family in this vicinity on Tuesday, and provided them with a good supply of food. Let other christians take example.

Gull Creek.

On Saturday night last, it rained sleet so that it was dangerous to travel. Mr. George Webb, who that night was returning home, fell and was badly hurt. It is said that he had to be carried home.

Three bears which were captured during last week, were noticed hanging at the road side opposite Mr. J. F. Lott's residence. Many an offer has been made for them but hitherto the offers were not accepted.

Hawley.

The missionary meeting was not largely attended, owing to the unfavorable weather, but the Christmas tree entertainment was a complete success. The singing, recitations, readings and dialogues, were very efficient, exhibiting the good training they received by O. Fretts, Superintendent; Miss A. Bristol, Mrs D. Fretts and others. The Kinder garten, under the training of Miss McManis, Teacher, was fine. The tree was adorned with many beautiful and costly presents. The Rev H. I. Allen (Pastor) was the recipient of $16 and a big turkey as a Xmas gift by his many friends, too numerous to mention.

Violet.

Mr. G. Shea says he experiences cold weather driving mail.

Mr. Nathan Lighthall is Mr. Charles Snider's sawyer. They do good work.

Mr. Herbert Robinson and Mr. John Hunter talk of having a hunt back on the Bald mountains. Good luck to you.

Mr. George Shea and Herbert Bateson arrived home safe and sound on Thursday from their hunt. They report the deer numerous.

Mr. Stephen Bennett has pulled his old house down on main street, and talks of building on Church street, opposite the carriage factory.

Selby.

Adolphustown and Fredericksburg.

The Rev. J. C. Ash tenders his thanks to friends in Fredericksburg for providing a pair of handsome turkeys for his Xmas table.

At Parma on Xmas we, the s chool house was packed almost to suffocation at the Xmas tree. Under the efficient superintendency of Mrs. Griffith, the S. S. in this locality, started only the past summer, has attained to a high degree of prosperity, and is an example of what an earnest, godly woman may accomplish for the public good. She received many loving testimonials from the school.

The Methodist Memorial Church, Adolphustown, held its annual festival on Xmas night, and while many feared a total failure on account of bad weather, it proved to be a marvelous success. Proceeds $36. Henceforth, this people must bear the palm for a spirit of undaunted courage in carrying forward their church enterprises in the face even of untoward conditions and circumstances. A New Year's festival will be held in the Methodist Church No 1, South Fredericksburg, on New Year's night, and no effort will be spared by the management to make it equal to their reputation for getting up firstrate tea-meetings. Rev. Messrs Peake, of Morven, Allen of Bath, and others may be expected.

The various Xmas gatherings in this locality have been singularly successful considering the unfavorable weather that has prevailed. On Friday last, though the storm had raged all day, the Conway Church was comfortably filled at the Xmas tree in the interests of the S. School. Mr. Frank D. Price, late S. Teacher at Sandhurst, and who is about moving to Napanee, has thrown himself with great vigour into our S. S. work here, and under his superintendency a very acceptable programme was submitted to the people. Among other expressions of good-will was the presentation to Mr. Joshua Cadman, an honored local preacher, of a valuable fur robe and a pair of horse blankets, as a testimonial of regard for the public services he has so cheerfully rendered. There are but few men in the county whose services have been more in demand for funerals, and especially among the poor, and it was felt that this expression of obligation and friendship was richly deserved; and the Conway friends are to be commended for taking the initiative in the matter.

Odessa.

Happy New Year,

Johnie McDermitt is home from N. Y. state.

Charlie Mabee, N. Y. state, is home for holidays.

Rev. and Mrs. Quartermaine spent Xmas at Brockville.

Alphena Hartman, of G. T. Ry., arrived home Monday.

David Huycke has returned for a few days from Deseronto.

J. A. Timmerman is spending the festive season at Ivanhoe, Ont.

Henry and Mrs. Smith and Georgie Watts are spending the holidays at Ottawa.

Mr. and Mrs Henry Braun, of Drayton, Ont., are visiting at Henry Benjamin's.

Dr. Millard Mabee, Milford, Mr and Mrs. McGuire, Ottawa, are home for Xmas.

We hung up our sock Christmas eve. What s'pose we got in it. Eh? why a hole in the heel.

The bazars and concerts on the 13th and 18th by the Methodists and Angelicans were quite successful.

Rev. Mr. Peake, of Morven, preached the anniversary sermons of the Odessa Methodist church Sunday eve.

Mr. Fraser, of Walhalla, Dak., Geo. Walker, Kingston, Dan. Gorden, Watertown, N. Y., were home for Christmas.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION.

Sketches of Scenes in the Court Room, Taken on the Spot.

The British are now enjoying (if it can be called enjoyment) one of their peculiar "state trials," of the kind that make up so large a part of England's political history. The phrase "state trial" does not necessarily mean that the government is the prosecutor, for, as in this case, the suit may be nominally between private parties, and yet the "government," meaning the party in power in the house of commons, and from which the cabinet is selected, be the real party in interest. In such cases, contrary to all American ideas of fair dealing, the attorney general often acts for the party who is on the "government" side. The annexed engraving represents the attorney general, Sir Richard Webster, opening the case, with the associate counsel and other "big wigs" grouped around him.

Sir Charles Russell, leading counsel for the Irish members, is one of the most suave of gentlemen, and maintains the most cordial personal relations with the opposing counsel; but the American reader who notes the sharp passages between them in the course of the examination may incline to consider this much like the quasi friendly handshake between two pugilists just before they proceed to the serious business of smashing each other's countenances out of all likeness to humanity.

As all American readers know, the question of home rule for Ireland has roused all the fury possible between belligerent Celt and stubborn Saxon; and it was only natural that the organization of the Land League and the attempts of the British authorities in Ireland to suppress it should lead to what is called "agrarian outrages." And as there are always hotheaded and revengeful individuals, there have been some murders, of which the most noted was the assassination of Cavendish and Burke in Phœnix Park, Dublin. Following this The London Times published a series of articles headed "Parnellism and Crime," charging the responsibility for these murders upon the Parnellites. Finally, it published alleged letters of Mr. Parnell justifying the murders. Messrs. Parnell and Egan promptly denounced these letters as forgeries. Hence the suit—nominally a civil suit, but really an attempt to determine judicially whether the Irish members of parliament have been inciting to outrage and murder.

It is, therefore, a trial of the greatest political importance—so important that the government consented to set aside the regular judicial machinery and have the case tried by a commission of eminent judges.

house down on main street, and talks of building on Church street, opposite the carriage factory.

Selby.

Mrs. Alex Hassard, of Dakota, is visiting friends in this section.

Misses Clara and Maggie Hudgins spent a few days in this vicinity this week.

The New Year's tree will be held on New Year's night as usual. Extra efforts will be made to make this a success.

The concert in connection with the public school of this place was a grand success. Notwithstanding the evening was rather unfavorable the house was filled to overflowing, and everyone went home well pleased with the evening's entertainment.

At the annual missionary meeting, in connection with the Methodist church, Rev. A. B. Chambers, of Napanee, delivered an eloquent sermon, after which A. L. Morden, Esq., made a few very practical remarks regarding the work. We are sorry to say the members did not respond as liberally as they might have done.

Tamworth.

Xmas passed off quite pleasantly here. The only drawback was the lack of snow.

Rob Penny went over to Marlbank and got so badly mixed that he fell and broke his leg, so he had to spend his Xmas at home.

The Xmas number of THE EXPRESS arrived safely and to say the least was grand. All admired it; it was a credit to the firm. May you be spared to get up many more. Wishing you a merrry Xmas and compliments of the season.

B. Detlor, Esq, our present Reeve, (rumor says), is going to step down and contest the deputy-reeveship with Dr. Yourex. This is looked upon as a bad step, for it is expected that Dr. Yourex will whip him so badly that he will never again aspire for municipal honors. The time has come when intelligent men should represent the township.

On Xmas night a grand teameeting was given in the Methodist Church here. Proceeds $40. The Pastor, Rev. Stratton, announced the indebtedness of the church and voluntary contributions were asked for. The men and women at once responded nobly and $500 were subscribed in a very few minutes, which wipes the debt out completely. Success to the people of Tamworth.

Napanee Mills.

Our gentlemanly railway agent, Mr. Budd, gave a party to a number of his friends on Monday evening at which a jolly time was spent.

Harry Haynes entertained some thirty of his friends right royally on Christmas night. The guests were made to feel perfectly at home, and six solid hours of side-spliting fun was enjoyed. Harry is a jolly fellow, whole-souled and big hearted, and his good mother is a most estimable lady. Both are much respected.

The annual school meeting was held Wednesday and a most judicious choice of a trustee made in the appointment of Mr: Geo. S. Madden. No fear that the interest of the school will suffer intrusted to the care of such men as Messrs. Madden and Davy. We understand the school room is to be made more comfortable by the substitution of coal for wood in heating.

A Sunday school entertainment takes place here on Friday evening, Jan. 11th. The scholars are now practising excellent selections of music for the occasion. The superintendent, Mr. Bravender, deserves the thanks of this community for his zeal and faithfulness in the good cause, and encouragement ought to be shown him by a large attendance of parents and others on the evening of the eleventh.

anniversary sermons of the Odessa Methodist church Sunday eve.

Mr. Fraser, of Walhalla, Dak., Geo. Walker, Kingston, Dan. Gorden, Watertown, N. Y., were home for Christmas.

The council candidates are not yet quite ripe enough to pull, although we expect to see a good holiday display in the shambles on nomination day.

Mr. Edward Watts, Syracuse, N. Y., Charlie Watts, Homsville, N. Y., and Henry and Mrs. Watts, Elginburg, Ont., attending their mother's funeral, were here over Christmas day.

If the janitor of the Methodist church would plunk all late comers down in the back seats, there'd soon be a scarcity of that kind, much to the delight of preacher and benefit of the congregation we're sure.

We are much obliged to Miss Botting, late teacher of 2nd department Odessa public school, for the following promotion examinations: Second class jr. to sr.—Resa Young, Douglas Laidley, Judson Babcock, Tommy Beverley. 2nd sr. to 3rd jr.—Carrie Steinburg, Ira Chadsey, Gertie Bennett, George Barry. 3rd jr. to 3rd sr.—Harry Lee, Louis Timmerman.

Mrs. William Workman died suddenly Friday morning last. The funeral, Monday, from the residence of her son, Mr. George Watts, to the Methodist church, thence to Cataraqui, was largely attended, five of her sons and a grandson being the pall-bearers. Rev. Young delivered an able sermon from Psalm CXVI—7th verse, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee" a text selected by the lady some months previous to her demise. The pastor paid a glowing deserved tribute to the stirling christian character of the late Mrs. Workman.

We propose to be a model correspondent for 1889, to sit high above the din and smoke of battle so as to give a fair account of the schermish of life, without prejudice, to weep with those who weep, rejoice with those who rejoice, and to gum it—Eh? naw, to let some other fellow gum it with those who have no teef. We'll take a good square start on the elections, and say to each candidate, striving to sit on the soft side of a bald-headed municipal chair, to be goaded by the ox gad of public opinion during '89, go it, we envy you not at all.

What To Do With Your Boys.

In the nineteenth annual circular of the Ontario Business College, Belleville, just published, will be found the amplest evidence that it occupies a position not reached by any similar institution in Canada. Among merchants and practical accountants this fact is everywhere acknowledged, and in consequence its graduates are pre eminently successful in securing positions. It has had students from twenty different states and provinces. The principals are Messrs. W. B. Robinson and J. W. Johnson, F. C. A. Send for their college circular. 5288eowb far judicial machinery and have the case tried by a commission of eminent judges.

ATTORNEY GENERAL WEBSTER SPEAKING.

Sir James Hannen presides over the commission with eminent dignity and impartiality as far as Americans can judge. He is 67 years old and a graduate of the far famed Heidelberg university. In 1853-55 he was a member of the commission that settled all matters then in issue between the United States and England. He has been judge of one high court or another ever since 1868. His associates on the commission are Sir John Charles Day and Sir Archibald Levin Smith.

The most important witness so far is one Capt. O'Shea, formerly an intimate associate of Mr. Parnell, and if he is successfully impeached, as the Irish members claim he can be, there is really no case against the Parnellites. The weight of testimony thus far certainly indicates that the letters are forgeries; but the counsel for The Times are heaping up evidence of a general outbreak of crime following the Parnell campaign. The trial has already resulted in some shocking revelations of treachery and malignity on the part of pretended friends of the Irish cause.

Sillsville.

Miss Hattie Sills is visiting friends in Belleville.

Mr. G. B. Card has moved to his new home at Enterprise.

Mr. Shultz and wife, from Vermont, are visiting their daughter, Mrs. Martin Hough.

The Rev. R. S. Forneri visited a poor family in this vicinity on Tuesday, and provided them with a good supply of food. Let other christians take example.

Gull Creek.

On Saturday night last, it rained sleet so that it was dangerous to travel. Mr. George Webb, who that night was returning home, fell and was badly hurt. It is said that he had to be carried home.

Three bears which were captured during last week, were noticed hanging at the road side opposite Mr. J. F. Lott's residence. Many an offer has been made for them but hitherto the offers were not accepted.

Hawley.

The missionary meeting was not largely attended, owing to the unfavorable weather, but the Christmas tree entertainment was a complete success. The singing, recitations, readings and dialogues, were very efficient, exhibiting the good training they received by O. Fretts, Superintendent; Miss A. Bristol, Mrs D. Fretts and others. The Kinder garten, under the training of Miss McManis, Teacher, was fine. The tree was adorned with many beautiful and costly presents. The Rev H. I. Allen (Pastor) was the recipient of $16 and a big turkey as a Xmas gift by his many friends, too numerous to mention.

Violet.

Mr. G. Shea says he experiences cold weather driving mail.

Mr. Nathan Lighthall is Mr. Charles Snider's sawyer. They do good work.

Mr. Herbert Robinson and Mr. John Hunter talk of having a hunt back on the Bald mountains. Good luck to you.

Mr. George Shea and Herbert Bateson arrived home safe and sound on Thursday from their hunt. They report the deer numerous.

Mr. Stephen Bennett has pulled his old house down on main street, and talks of building on Church street, opposite the carriage factory.

Selby.

Adolphustown and Fredericksburg.

The Rev. J. C. Ash tenders his thanks to friends in Fredericksburg for providing a pair of handsome turkeys for his Xmas table.

At Parma on Xmas we, the school house was packed almost to suffocation at the Xmas tree. Under the efficient superintendency of Mrs. Griffith, the S. S. in this locality, started only the past summer, has attained to a high degree of prosperity, and is an example of what an earnest, godly woman may accomplish for the public good. She received many loving testimonials from the school.

The Methodist Memorial Church, Adolphustown, held its annual festival on Xmas night, and while many feared a total failure on account of bad weather, it proved to be a marvelous success. Proceeds $36. Henceforth, this people must bear the palm for a spirit of undaunted courage in carrying forward their church enterprises in the face even of untoward conditions and circumstances. A New Year's festival will be held in the Methodist Church No 1, South Fredericksburg, on New Year's night, and no effort will be spared by the management to make it equal to their reputation for getting up firstrate tea-meetings. Rev. Messrs Peake, of Morven, Allen of Bath, and others may be expected.

The various Xmas gatherings in this locality have been singularly successful considering the unfavorable weather that has prevailed. On Friday last, though the storm had raged all day, the Conway Church was comfortably filled at the Xmas tree in the interests of the S. School. Mr. Frank D. Price, late S. Teacher at Sandhurst, and who is about moving to Napanee, has thrown himself with great vigour into our S. S. work here, and under his superintendency a very acceptable programme was submitted to the people. Among other expressions of good-will was the presentation to Mr. Joshua Cadman, an honored local preacher, of a valuable fur robe and a pair of horse blankets, as a testimonial of regard for the public services he has so cheerfully rendered. There are but few men in the county whose services have been more in demand for funerals, and especially among the poor, and it was felt that this expression of obligation and friendship was richly deserved; and the Conway friends are to be commended for taking the initiative in the matter.

Odessa.

Happy New Year,

Johnie McDermitt is home from N. Y. state.

Charlie Mabee, N. Y. state, is home for holidays.

Rev. and Mrs. Quartermaine spent Xmas at Brockville.

Alphena Hartman, of G. T. Ry., arrived home Monday.

David Huycke has returned for a few days from Deseronto.

J. A. Timmerman is spending the festive season at Ivanhoe, Ont.

Henry and Mrs. Smith and Georgie Watts are spending the holidays at Ottawa.

Mr. and Mrs Henry Braun, of Drayton, Ont., are visiting at Henry Benjamin's.

Dr. Millard Mabee, Milford, Mr and Mrs. McGuire, Ottawa, are home for Xmas.

We hung up our sock Christmas eve. What s'pose we got in it. Eh? why a hole in the heel.

The bazars and concerts on the 13th and 18th by the Methodists and Angelicans were quite successful.

Rev. Mr. Peake, of Morven, preached the anniversary sermons of the Odessa Methodist church Sunday eve.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION.

Sketches of Scenes in the Court Room, Taken on the Spot.

The British are now enjoying (if it can be called enjoyment) one of their peculiar "state trials," of the kind that make up so large a part of England's political history. The phrase "state trial" does not necessarily mean that the government is the prosecutor, for, as in this case, the suit may be nominally between private parties, and yet the "government," meaning the party in power in the house of commons, and from which the cabinet is selected, be the real party in interest. In such cases, contrary to all American ideas of fair dealing, the attorney general often acts for the party who is on the "government" side. The annexed engraving represents the attorney general, Sir Richard Webster, opening the case, with the associate counsel and other "big wigs" grouped around him.

Sir Charles Russell, leading counsel for the Irish members, is one of the most suave of gentlemen, and maintains the most cordial personal relations with the opposing counsel; but the American reader who notes the sharp passages between them in the course of the examination may incline to consider this much like the quasi friendly handshake between two pugilists just before they proceed to the serious business of smashing each other's countenances out of all likeness to humanity.

As all American readers know, the question of home rule for Ireland has roused all the fury possible between belligerent Celt and stubborn Saxon; and it was only natural that the organization of the Land League and the attempts of the British authorities in Ireland to suppress it should lead to what is called "agrarian outrages." And as there are always hotheaded and revengeful individuals, there have been some murders, of which the most noted was the assassination of Cavendish and Burke in Phœnix Park, Dublin. Following this The London Times published a series of articles headed "Parnellism and Crime," charging the responsibility for these murders upon the Parnellites. Finally, it published alleged letters of Mr. Parnell justifying the murders. Messrs. Parnell and Egan promptly denounced these letters as forgeries. Hence the suit—nominally a civil suit, but really an attempt to determine judicially whether the Irish members of parliament have been inciting to outrage and murder.

It is, therefore, a trial of the greatest political importance—so important that the government consented to set aside the regular judicial machinery and have the case tried by a commission of eminent judges.

building on Church street, opposite the carriage factory.

Selby.

Mrs. Alex Hassard, of Dakota, is visiting friends in this section.

Misses Clara and Maggie Hudgins spent a few days in this vicinity this week.

The New Year's tree will be held on New Year's night as usual. Extra efforts will be made to make this a success.

The concert in connection with the public school of this place was a grand success. Notwithstanding the evening was rather unfavorable the house was filled to overflowing, and everyone went home well pleased with the evening's entertainment.

At the annual missionary meeting, in connection with the Methodist church, Rev. A. B. Chambers, of Napanee, delivered an eloquent sermon, after which A. L. Morden, Esq., made a few very practical remarks regarding the work. We are sorry to say the members did not respond as liberally as they might have done.

Tamworth.

Xmas passed off quite pleasantly here. The only drawback was the lack of snow.

Rob Penny went over to Marlbank and got so badly mixed that he fell and broke his leg, so he had to spend his Xmas at home.

The Xmas number of THE EXPRESS arrived safely and to say the least was grand. All admired it; it was a credit to the firm. May you be spared to get up many more. Wishing you a merrry Xmas and compliments of the season.

B. Detlor, Esq, our present Reeve, (rumor says), is going to step down and contest the deputy-reeveship with Dr. Yourex. This is looked upon as a bad step, for it is expected that Dr. Yourex will whip him so badly that he will never again aspire for municipal honors. The time has come when intelligent men should represent the township.

On Xmas night a grand teameeting was given in the Methodist Church here. Proceeds $40. The Pastor, Rev. Stratton, announced the indebtedness of the church and voluntary contributions were asked for. The men and women at once responded nobly and $500 were subscribed in a very few minutes, which wipes the debt out completely. Success to the people of Tamworth.

Napanee Mills.

Our gentlemanly railway agent, Mr. Budd, gave a party to a number of his friends on Monday evening at which a jolly time was spent.

Harry Haynes entertained some thirty of his friends right royally on Christmas night. The guests were made to feel perfectly at home, and six solid hours of side-spliting fun was enjoyed. Harry is a jolly fellow, whole-souled and big hearted, and his good mother is a most estimable lady. Both are much respected.

The annual school meeting was held Wednesday and a most judicious choice of a trustee made in the appointment of Mr. Geo. S. Madden. No fear that the interest of the school will suffer intrusted to the care of such men as Messrs. Madden and Davy. We understand the school room is to be made more comfortable by the substitution of coal for wood in heating.

A Sunday school entertainment takes place here on Friday evening, Jan. 11th. The scholars are now practising excellent selections of music for the occasion. The superintendent, Mr. Bravender, deserves the thanks of this community for his zeal and faithfulness in the good cause, and encouragement ought to be shown him by a large attendance of parents and others on the evening of the eleventh.

anniversary sermons of the Odessa Methodist church Sunday eve.

Mr. Fraser, of Walhalla, Dak., Geo. Walker, Kingston, Dan. Gorden, Watertown, N. Y., were home for Christmas.

The council candidates are not yet quite ripe enough to pull, although we expect to see a good holiday display in the shambles on nomination day.

Mr. Edward Watts, Syracuse, N. Y., Charlie Watts, Homsville, N. Y., and Henry and Mrs. Watts, Elginburg, Ont., attending their mother's funeral, were here over Christmas day.

If the janitor of the Methodist church would plunk all late comers down in the back seats, there'd soon be a scarcity of that kind, much to the delight of preacher and benefit of the congregation we're sure.

We are much obliged to Miss Botting, late teacher of 2nd department Odessa public school, for the following promotion examinations: Second class jr. to sr.—Resa Young, Douglas Laidley, Judson Babcock, Tommy Beverley. 2nd sr. to 3rd jr.—Carrie Steinburg, Ira Chadsey, Gertie Bennett, George Barry. 3rd jr. to 3rd sr.—Harry Lee, Louis Timmerman.

Mrs. William Workman died suddenly Friday morning last. The funeral, Monday, from the residence of her son, Mr. George Watts, to the Methodist church, thence to Cataraqui, was largely attended, five of her sons and a grandson being the pall-bearers. Rev. Young delivered an able sermon from Psalm CXVI—7th verse, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee" a text selected by the lady some months previous to her demise. The pastor paid a glowing deserved tribute to the stirling christian character of the late Mrs. Workman.

We propose to be a model correspondent for 1889, to sit high above the din and smoke of battle so as to give a fair account of the schermish of life, without prejudice, to weep with those who weep, rejoice with those who rejoice, and to gum it—Eh? naw, to let some other fellow gum it with those who have no teef. We'll take a good square start on the elections, and say to each candidate, striving to sit on the soft side of a bald-headed municipal chair, to be goaded by the ox gad of public opinion during '89, go it, we envy you not at all.

What To Do With Your Boys.

far judicial machinery and have the case tried by a commission of eminent judges.

ATTORNEY GENERAL WEBSTER SPEAKING.

Sir James Hannen presides over the commission with eminent dignity and impartiality as far as Americans can judge. He is 67 years old and a graduate of the far famed Heidelberg university. In 1853-55 he was a member of the commission that settled all matters then in issue between the United States and England. He has been judge of one high court or another ever since 1868. His associates on the commission are Sir John Charles Day and Sir Archibald Levin Smith.

The most important witness so far is one Capt. O'Shea, formerly an intimate associate of Mr. Parnell, and if he is successfully impeached, as the Irish members claim he can be, there is really no case against the Parnellites. The weight of testimony thus far certainly indicates that the letters are forgeries; but the counsel for The Times are heaping up evidence of a general outbreak of crime following the Parnell campaign. The trial has already resulted in some shocking revelations of treachery and malignity on the part of pretended friends of the Irish cause.

YOUNG FOLKS.

A Telephone Message.

Ah! Here's the little round thing my papa talks into
To tell the folks down town what he wants to have them do.
I'm going to try myself,—now let me get a chair,
And then I'll stand on tiptoe so I can reach up there

"Halloo! (that's what they all say)—you dear old Santa Clause,
I'm going to have a little talk with you, because I want to tell you alll about a little girl I know,
Who never had a Christmas in her life—she told me so!

I hardly could believe it, but she says 'tis really true.
I'm sure you're always very kind, but I'm surprised at you,
That you should have forgotten such a little one! but still,
You have, perhaps already all the stockings you can fill.

But could you go to her house instead of coming here?
For mamma says that Christmas is the time of all the year
For children to remember poor little girls and boys
Who never hang their stockings up for picture-books and toys.

"I want you please, to carry her a doll with shiny curls.
And eyes that shut and open—that's the kind for little girls—
And a muff to warm her fingers, and a cunning little ring,
And a book with pretty verses—how she'll laugh, the little thing!

"And give her lots of goodies, too, because she's poor, you see,
And ought to have more sugar-plums than you could bring to me,
Now tell it on your fingers, and remember, as you go—
Just pack her little stocking to the very, very toe.

"That's all—only, Santa Claus, I just would like to say,
If you should have more presents than you need on Christmas day,
And could leave me just a few as you pass the chimney—why,
Of course—I would be very glad indeed. Good-bye! Good bye!"

HOW MAXY SPENT ONE CHRISTMAS.

BY MARCH ELLINWOOD.

It was a queer way to spend Christmas, and a queer place for that matter. Maxy had hardly done talking about it before another Christmas came around.

The day had begun very much like others that she remembered, there had been stockings filled with all sorts of delightful things. There had been the usual merry strife to see which should be first with Christmas greeting, then such a happy time at breakfast.

There was one thing about Christmas in Maxy's home that was a little singular, it always kept getting better and better, and the evening was the best of all.

Sometimes, you know, little folks begin to get tired, and after Tommy has eaten a stockingful of nuts and candy he thinks that Willie had more than he did, or his presents don't suit him and he goes to bed feeling that Christmas is a myth.

The secret of it all was in the beginning. Mamma Monroe had them begin right. For one thing they must eat no candy before breakfast—but this won't do, I must go back to my story.

Maxy expected this day to be a little better than an ordinary Christmas; for there was to be company to dinner, and some of her best friends would be there with their papas and mammas, and the whole house was in a delightful state of bustle about 10 o'clock, when Mrs. Monroe called Maxy and gave her a basket to carry to old Mrs. Brown. "You may step and ask Dolly to go with you," she said. Maxy was pleased, for she knew how glad the poor old lady would be, and she loved to hear her praise mamma's goodies, and tell how good she was not to forget an old woman on Christmas day.

footprints, and Maxy had the basket with her in the closet, so that there wasn't trace of her presence to befound.

Mr. Monroe went home quite perplexed, but half hoping to find his little girl there before him.

But no Maxy was there. Quite a little company had gathered by this time, for it was nearly 2 o'clock, the hour for the dinner.

Mamma Monroe said hopefully: "She must have gone somewhere else. She must have gone to Mrs. Brown's while she was out, and she has taken the basket to some one else," but she looked pale and her eyes were anxious.

Dollie was crying in a little heap in a sofa corner, and Katie kept her company.

The ladies gathered around Mrs. Monroe full of sympathy, each one trying to think of something hopeful to say.

At last Papa Monroe said he would go to Mrs. Smith's quite at the other end of town, and see if Maxy had taken her basket there. Mrs. Smith had sometimes worked for Mrs Monroe and Maxy knew she was poor and needed help, she might possibly have thought of her, finding Mrs. Brown absent. A whole long hour dragged by, for he stopped to ask questions of everyone who seemed at all likely to have seen the child, before Papa Monroe came back.

Everybody had been trying to cheer up everybody else, but it did seem so strange that she should be gone so long, that it was hard work to find anything hopeful to say.

"She couldn't lose her way," said Mamma Monroe. "She knows every street in town."

"Here comes papa, alone," said Katie, with her face against the window, and with that she began crying again.

Papa came in, the picture of despair. Mamma grew white and she hadn't a word to say.

Suddenly there was some one stamping off snow in the hall, and a gay little voice cried: "Mamma, am I late for dinner?" Then there was a great rush, you may be sure. Everybody laughed and cried and kissed Maxy, and she told her story as well as she could, and after a while the Christmas dinner was eaten.

"Only think, mamma," said Maxy, "I spent 'most all my Christmas in that closet, and scared you 'most to death, just because I was afraid of that tramp, and he didn't come in after all."

"We all make mistakes, little daughter," said her mother tenderly, "but you are safe and your Christmas isn't quite gone yet."

Youth.

Ah! through the moonlight of autumnal years
How sweet the back-look of our first youth world!
Freshlier and earlier the spring burst then:
The wild brook warbled to a sweeter time,
Through Summer shows that screened from brighter suns;
The berry glittered and the brown nut fell
Riper and riper in the Autumn woods;
And winter drifting on more glorious car
Shed purer snows or shot intenser frosts!
The young were merrier when our life was young:
Dropped mellower wisdom from the tongue of age,
And love and friendship were immortal things;
From fairer lips diviner music flowed;
The song was sacred, and the poet too,
Not art, but inspiration, was his song.

ROBERT BUCHANAN.

His Marriage Wasn't a Failure.

PUTNEY.

One of The Many Villages Engulfed by Mighty London.

BY DAVID KER.

I remember during the Carlist war of 1874 in the north of Spain a Guipuzcoan peasant, being asked by a correspondent whether any one had been killed in a recent skirmish, replied epigramatically, "Ni hombre, ni muger, solamente un cura," (neither man nor woman, only a parish priest.) In the same way Putney may be defined as neither town nor country, only a suburb. Not many years ago it was an independent village on the Thames, with a very distinct individuality of its own and no small sense of its importance, but it is now virtually annexed by that mighty capital which, like a kind of geographical Bismarck, keeps swallowing one by one all the smaller communities within reach. Judging only by the green hedgerows, the trim garden patches and fields behind them, the oarsmen in white flannel sweeping with measured strokes over the broad shining river, the gray church tower looking down upon them from amid its clustering elms, the tilt-covered wagons plodding along the high road, the wide stretch of grassy common, where the cricketers are playing, or the great army of stately trees on the further shore, through which the Bishop of London's palace half reveals its dark red walls, one might imagine one's self miles away from any town, in the very heart of the country. But the permanent shower of soot that "droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven upon the place beneath"—necessitating a washing of hands frequent and vigorous enough to have satisfied a Pharisee—as well as the white omnibuses that come rumbling across Putney Bridge with the fatal word "Bank" conspicuously painted on their sides, are a sufficient reminder how few miles lie between us and the great city which an American tourist defined as "just like New York bigger and uglier and the oysters not so good."

These, however, are not the only characteristic features of this boundary line between the land of plows and the land of paving stones. On the spot where the two districts meet the two opposing tribes that inhabit them meet likewise. Every train that comes up the river bank on Saturday afternoon or Sunday morning disgorge into the quiet, old-fashioned High-street of Putney a crowd of sallow, keen-eyed, jaded-looking men and women, who seem to carry about with them even in this place of repose that air of eternal unrest which is one of the most marked and terrible feature of London. These are clerks and shopmen from the city, mantuamakers from Regent street, bartenders from the Strand, obviously enjoying their brief holiday to the utmost but as obviously enjoying it "against time," and taking their pleasure in the same rushing, bustling way in which they do their business.

Of historical memories Putney has fewer than many of the neighboring suburbs, but it is not without interesting associations of its own. One such at least it possesses which would doubtless outvie all the glories of Westminster Abbey in the eyes of enthusiasts like those who made a special pilgrimage to Farnborough in order to behold the hallowed spot where Sayers and Heenan battered each other's faces out of all semblance of humanity 25 years ago. Between Putney and Mortlake lies the famous "University course," on which the picked oarsmen of Oxford and Cambridge fight it out every year for the supremacy of the river, and a walk of two miles up stream brings one to the very spot where, in 1829, may step and ask Dolly to go with you," she said. Maxy was pleased, for she knew how glad the poor old lady would be, and she loved to hear her praise mamma's goodies, and tell how good she was not to forget an old woman on Christmas day.

So she put on her warm wraps and started out in high glee. It was snowing a little, and nothing was so charming as to be out in a snow storm; a feathery, dry snow like this.

Dolly had a sore throat and could not go; Maxy trudged on without her and enjoyed every step of her long walk through the falling snow.

The only blot upon her happiness was Dolly's sore throat.

Her first little tap at Mrs. Brown's door brought no answer, so she knocked louder, then again; but all was still. "She's gone to the neighbor's," thought Maxy; "I'll go in and leave the basket and get warm, anyway, if the door's unlocked," and in she walked.

She looked around carefully. Mrs. Brown might be asleep on the lounge, but no, the house was quite deserted, but the fire still shone red through the cracks in the stove, and Maxy sat down to warm her feet.

Presently the gate latch clicked.

"She's coming" said Maxy,, peeping from the window. "Oh my! it's a tramp!" And it was; one of the dirtiest and most forlorn, at that, and Maxy, like many another little girl, was terribly afraid of anything that looked like a tramp.

"Maybe he'll come right in," she thought, "like I did. What shall I do?" There was but a minute to think. Maxy glanced quickly around and spied a closet door standing ajar. "I'll slip in here and take the basket with me, for he mustn't find that." A minute more and Mary, safely hidden in the closet, heard a knock at the front door, then a shuffling step passed around the house. Then came a knock at the back door, and after a pause the shuffling step came back, the gate clicked again and all was still.

The little girl gave a sigh of relief, for her prison was dark and close, and besides she was beginning to feel in a hurry to go home; but, alas, the door would not open.

In vain she pushed; in vain she turned the little knob. The door had locked itself!

Maxy wanted to cry then, but she tried hard to be brave. "Maybe Mrs. Brown will be back soon and I can make her hear me," she said. "Won't she be scared?"

It was dark in the little closet; there was nothing to do but think, and Maxy thought about the folks at home. What were they doing now? Had she been gone so long as it seemed? And were they wondering why she did not come? What if Mrs. Brown had gone somewhere to spend the day? At this one or two tears fell down.

"I know what I'll do, I'll ask the Lord to help me get out," and down she went on her knees in the dark and offered her prayer, with so much faith that she felt comforted at once.

It was warm in her small prison, and by-and-by, leaning against a pile of comforts, Maxy fell asleep.

Meanwhile they were getting anxious about her at home. Katie had been looking out at the door or window every few minutes for half an hour, and how mamma had begun to say, "How strange it is she doesn't come." The minutes passed on and no Maxy came. At last Papa Monroe could bear it no longer, and he started out to look for her. At Dollie's home he found that she had gone alone and hurried on wondering where she could be. "She would hurry home to-day of all days," he said to himself, "and she is such a faithful little thing, anyway."

He found Mrs. Brown at home, and she assured him that Maxy had not been there.

Expensive Building Material.

"How is your papa getting along?" asked Mrs. Yeast of the Crimsonbeak boy, the other day, when she was waiting for his mother to make her appearance in the parlor.

"Oh, bully! He's going to build a house."

"Going to build a house! How do you know that?"

"Well, I heard mamma say he brings a brick home in his hat every night."

He Didn't Know.

School-mistress—Come here, Charlie, and let me hear you recite your lesson. Why, what is the matter? What are you crying for?

Charlie—Some of the big boys made me kiss a little girl out in the school yard—boo-hoo!

Why, that is outrageous! Why did you not come right in to me?

I—I—didn't know that you would let me kiss you.

She Got a Seat.

She was a little cross eyed woman, and she had stood up in a street car and clung to a strap till she was tired. Suddenly she spoke:

"Thank you, sir. Since you kindly offer me a seat I will take it."

Six men looked up. Each one of the six thought she was staring at himself, and she took her choice of the six seats instantly placed on her disposal. Wonderful is the power of the human eye when it happens to be a little askew.

It Might be Worse.

The Arabs, says an exchange, have a custom of thanking God that it is no worse. If he loses an eye, he thanks God that it was not both eyes; if he loses a hand, he thanks God it was not both hands; if he breaks his leg, he thanks God it was not his neck.

Dr. Johnson used to say that a habit of looking at the best side of every event is better than a thousand pounds a year. When Fenelon's library was on fire, "God be praised," he exclaimed, "that it is not the dwelling of some poor man!"

This is the true spirit of submission; one of the most beautiful traits that can possess the heart. Will not every reader resolve to see the sunny side of the world? If so, you have partly won the battle of life at the outset.

At a Western church fair a device for getting up a testimonial to the pastor bore the following legend:—"Drop a dollar in the slot and see the pastor smile."

mous "University course," on which the picked oarsmen of Oxford and Cambridge fight it out every year for the supremacy of the river, and a walk of two miles up stream brings one to the very spot where, in 1829, the Cambridge crew struggled manfully on till their boat actually sank beneath them.

But the town itself offers to its visitors other associations of more ancient date and not inferior interest, even when coupled with the one great disadvantage that nobody can bet upon them. Half way up the High-street, in strange contrast to the trim modern shop fronts and plate-glass windows on either side of it, appears an antique mansion of dark red brickwork, over the spacious front of which the clinging ivy has trailed itself so thickly that in many places the masonry is completely hidden, and the small lozenge-paned casements of the upper story look out from a frame of living green. High upon the ridge of the steep red-tiled roof stand half a dozen of those tall, gaunt, brick chimney stacks beloved by all our great-grandfathers, forming a striking foil to the fresh green leaves of the noble trees behind them, while an old-fashioned sun dial stares out from between the two upper windows of the side wall overhanging the courtyard, which is separated from the street by a heavy wooden gate, on whose weather-stained posts appear the words, "Fairfax House."

There, indeed, is history, and history of the highest class. Does not the very name of Fairfax carry one back more than 200 years to the time when the free spirit of England was battling for life and death against "the right divine of Kings to govern wrong!" As the shadowy twilight deepens around the quaint old mansion, it needs little stretch of fancy to picture to one's self in the recess of one of its ivied windows two men seated at a table covered with papers, one of whom—a tall, fine-looking man, in the prime of life, whose dress is a compromise between the stern simplicity of the Puritan and the fantastic splendor of the Cavalier, looks up nervously ever and anon, as if finding something not wholly to his liking either in the contents of the papers or in the words of his companion. It is Lord Fairfax brave, handsome, elegant, accomplished, lacking nothing save that ruthless concentration of purpose which is the main strength of the stout, plainly-dressed, coarse-featured man opposite him, who has already acquired some reputation under the title of Gen. Oliver Cromwell.

These, however, are not the only relics of this kind which Putney has to show. Just on the other side of the street from my present quarters stands Winchester House, which would be a perfect treasure to Miss Braddon or Wilkie Collins, not merely from its outward aspect, but also from what it contains. The charm begins from the very entrance hall itself, in which a tall, thin high-backed, uncompromising chair, which might have seated Clarissa Harlowe's father while scolding that unfortunate young woman 150 years ago, faces a quaint old Dutch carving in oak, representing a piratical-looking Cavalier riding gallantly upon a very corpulent horse over the jagged letters of one of those delightful inscriptions which only two or three people can decipher at all, and which each of those two or three deciphers in a totally different way. The library is crowded with parchment-bound folios of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, which, as the innocent old country gentleman said of the man who was presented to him as a Baronet of James I.'s creation, "look remarkably well for their age."

And as with one room so with all the rest. Stern and stately figures in faintly-glimmering armor or towering Louis XIV. wigs look stonily down upon you from the shadowy walls.

Unhappily the ghostly traditions of this neighborhood are not all groundless and childish. Dickens once said, justly enough, that he would rather hear many a German legend with a terrific name than the true story of any old set of chambers in Lincoln's Inn; and the same thing might be said with equally good reason of more than one ancient manor house within easy reach of London itself. I can well remember how, years ago, a quiet old Kentish country house started into sudden and terrible prominence as the scene of a tragedy ghastly enough to draw thither from the capital hundreds, if not thousands, of pilgrims whom no ordinary attraction could have dragged so far from their congenial smoke and dirt.

For many generations the history of th fatal house had been as uneventful as that of the rooks which built their nests in the trees around it. Successive dynasties of hard riding, hard drinking country gentlemen flourished and faded, each exactly like his predecessor. It was only among a few of the very oldest "smockfrocks" in the adjacent village that there still lingered a vague tradition—told now and then by a Christmas fireside with many a knowing shake of the head—respecting a fearful tragedy that had taken place "up at the great house" in the days of old Queen Bess, more than 300 years before. It was whispered that the then lord of the manor betrayed by his wife and his most intimate friend, had taken a dreadful revenge upon the guilty pair, the exact nature of which seemed to be as completely a mystery to the tellers of the story as to every one else. At length the existing proprietor—a hearty, jovial country Squire, who liked nothing better that to fill his house with guests—found even his spacious accommodations too small to keep pace with his boundless hospitality, and decided upon adding a room, or perhaps two, to his house.

Accordingly a London architect was summoned to survey the premises and direct the proposed additions. The expert came, and after going over the house and making sundry measurements, said to his patron, with an air of mingled surprise and amusement: "It seems to me, sir, that you are giving yourself a good deal of unnecessary trouble, for you are probably not aware that there is a room in your house which is still unoccupied."

"Impossible," cried Squire. "I've lived in this house, man and boy, over 50 years, and neither I nor my father before me ever knew of any rooms in this house except those that are in use every day."

"For all that," replied the architect, confidently, "I'm positive that I cannot be wrong. According to the measurements that I have just taken there is a certain space within the walls which is still unaccounted for. In fact, I feel so sure of what I say that if you will allow me to go over the house once more I am willing to stake my professional reputation that I point out the very spot where the missing room is to be found."

The air of perfect conviction with which the man spoke staggered the Squire, while his wife, delighted at the idea of such a romance in her own house, declared that she was absolutely dying to see the "Bluebeard's Chamber." The guests with whom the house was overflowing as usual unanimously agreed that the mysterious room ought to be unearthed forthwith; and when the expert started on his second round he headed a procession comprising the whole population of the house. Many of the younger men, little dreaming what they were about to see, cracked boyish jests about buried treasures and imprisoned ghosts; and there was a general buzz of excitement when the architect, tapping the wall just above the great staircase, announced that behind it lay the long-lost chamber.

MANHOOD
How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by about buried treasures and imprisoned ghosts; and there was a general buzz of excitement when the architect, tapping the wall just above the great staircase, announced that behind it lay the long-lost chamber.

A few blows from the pickaxes of two sturdy laborers laid bare an oaken door clamped with iron, which was speedily burst in. Through the gap crept a damp stifling, sickening odor, at which the gay revelers shivered and drew back as if from the chill breath of the grave. There was a momentary pause, and then the biggest of the workman thrust himself through the mysterious doorway with a defiant oath, only to come staggering back the next moment with his bold, bluff visage as pale as death. Then the Squire himself, with a look of very unwonted gravity upon his jovial face, forced the rusty door wide open. Within lay a small oak-paneled chamber, richly furnished in the style of the sixteenth century, but the dust lay thick on the carved chairs, the costly hangings were faded and mildewed, the silver plates and goblets on the table looked dim and tarnished. In the two further corners of this living tomb lay two human skeletons, (seemingly those of a man and a woman,) whose distorted attitudes told but too plainly in what fearful agonies they must have died.

Putting Down Bribery.

It is satisfactory to find Republicans and Democrats uniting in a demand for stringent laws against bribery at Presidential elections. Of course such laws must be passed by the State Legislatures. A Republican paper of St. Louis says that there were between fourteen and twenty thousand "floaters"—we in Canada call them loose fish—in Indiana alone, every one of them seeking money. It was a ten dollar apiece campaign in that State, and many got twenty dollars for their votes. The plans for raising funds in precincts varied according to the local bosses. In one place the chairman called together secretly the half-dozen men who would in all probability be applicants for the post office, in the event of the party's success. He proposed to them an arrangement which was carried out in this way: Each of the six put up $50, making a fund of $300 for that town. Next they drew lots to see who should have the post-office. Then the lucky man gave each of the five his note for $50, payable after he received the appointment as postmaster. All present pledged themselves to abide by the agreement, and in this way that particular precinct was provided for. Indiana was corrupted because, having been a pivotal State, it had been corrupted in previous elections.

Slaves of Fashion.

Mrs. Anna J. Miller, when she delivered her terrific anathema against bustles in the Detroit Women's Convention characterized them as optical horrors and wretched humps, and declared that women would travel the world over to find skilled surgeons had nature so disfigured her. Anna forgot that women were not born in theatre bonnets or French boots, and that all of their everyday attire and adornment is the invention of necessity and taste, bad taste, maybe, but still women's taste. The decree of a dozen women's congresses and all the ridicule that the newspapers can indite won't shrink the bustle or lower the bonnets and boot heels till the sweet pretty creatures find something equally sytlish, and get tired of them. A trim, nicely adjusted, flexible, spring elastic, incontrovertible wire-woven, and harmonious bustle is a good thing. Its powers of endurance are wonderful. The more you sit down upon it the more popular it seems to grow. Suppose you let the bustle alone and talk was given up for dead. About 16 hours later, however, while the friends stood around and silently admired the beauty of the corpse the babe awoke, and smilingly demanded a drink of milk.

Says an English paper :—The first inventor of the sewing machine turns out not to be Howe, but a man named Thomas Saint, who took out his patent in 1760, sixty years before Howe produced his machine. A machine made according to Saint's specification is now being exhibited at the exhibition of sewing machines and domestic appliances at the Royal Agricultural Hall, Islington.

Squaring the circle is generally looked upon as either sheer lunacy or unprofitable figuring. It appears, however, that Mr. W. J. Barnwell, a wonderfully clever mathematician and the organist of the East Hundred in Berkshire, England, has really hit upon some feasible scheme, which he has laid before the French Academy of Sciences. His formula consists of eight figures, which, in a concrete shape, form a perfect cyclometer. The discovery has taken fifteen years' hard work.

Forgery and embezzlement are evidently no longer looked upon with the indulgent leniency with which courts of justice in the United States once regarded them. The Sentence of twenty-five years' imprisonment pronounced upon James E. Bedell should have a tendency to discourage these crimes, at any rate in the State of New York. The judgment of the court is generally approved of by the community in New York, who have come to the conclusion that criminals of this class can no longer be trifled with.

It cannot but be mortifying to the national pride of our American cousins to find that citizens of the United States have so often, when abroad, to depend upon the courtesy of British consuls for protection. The most recent instance was at Port-au-Prince, where the captain and passengers of an American steamer seized by a Haytian man-of-war had to beg the protection of the British consul, the U. S. official there having to confess he was powerless to render any assistance. The fact that the British consuls in foreign ports have always been ready to give their good offices on behalf of distressed Americans ought to promote a very friendly feeling towards Great Britain on the part of Americans at home, but, as it often happens that the conferring of a benefit is considered by the person benefited as a ground of grievance against the benefactor, a similar anomaly may occur in the case of nations.

PRISON GATES.

Mercer Reformatory.

"What institute is that?" is the invariable enquiry of the tourist.

"The Mercer Reformatory, for women," is the reply given, provided the question be asked of a well informed citizen.

Passing through the front offices to the reformatory proper, I was shown first the privilege corridor, a bright, airy department, containing some dozen cells.

These cells are really tiny bed chambers, each lighted by a separate window. They contain the needful toilet appliances, a chair, box, bracket shelves and small iron bedstead.

The bedding consists of blankets, sheets, pillows and white quilts, and looks as inviting as any weary body could desire. Altogether these diminutive rooms, so fresh in their cleanliness, must become potent factors in purifying the hearts and lives of their occupants.

"These cells are awarded to those inmates whose good conduct justifies the bestowal of a special privilege," remarked my guide, "and they are a possession much coveted by the inmates."

Further on we entered the sewing room, where the clothing is made and repaired I examined the piles of underclothing that lay en readiness for use, and found all the articles needful for a woman's wardrobe, neatly made of heavy factory cotton.

The inmates wear a uniform costume of blue denham, a material much the same as that used for shirting and overalls On Sunday each woman is given a long white apron and a linen collar. They are allowed the privilege of dressing their hair, which is not cut upon entering the institution, in any neat method.

"The inmates are not allowed to wear any of their own clothing during their stay in the institution," said the attendant. "It is put away for them until their term expires."

"Do they generally come in well supplied?" I asked.

"Occasionally they are very well dressed," was the reply; "but often they are in a terrible state of destitution. It depends a good deal upon the offence for which they are arrested."

Retracing our steps, we next visited the knitting room. In this department all the knitting required by the institution is done, in addition to contract work, which is occasionally given.

"In the knitting and sewing departments," said the attendant, "we have those inmates who, by reason of bodily weakness, are unfitted for more arduous service."

"Have you any difficulty in controlling those under your care?" I enquired, glancing at the groups who were knitting and indulging in quiet conversation.

"Not much," she answered. "They work largely by impulse, and have no more steadiness of purpose than little children. It is difficult also to retain their attention for any length of time. We have educational classes in the knitting room, through the winter months, for an hour and a half each day, when those who wish to do so may learn to read and write."

As education is certainly an aid to reformation, it would surely be a desirable thing to continue these classes all the year around.

The laundry is financially the most productive department in the Mercer; its net revenue last year amounted to over $2,000. There are two distinct laundries, one being used for the Mercer and Central Prison washing; the second being reserved for family and contract washing.

How many respectable working girls are there in Toronto who are compelled to live on less than that amount?

Out of 142 inmates committed, 77 were sentenced for six months, 24 for twelve months, and the reminder between one and two years.

Of these 46 were under 20 years of age, 50 between 20 and 30, 38 between 30 and 50, and the remainder over 50 years.

Fifty out of 142, or over one-third of the total number, were guilty of personal immorality in various phases, 35 were committed for vagrancy, 25 for larceny and 16 for drunkenness.

"There is very little sickness among the inmates of the institution," said the attendant, answering my enquiry. "The hospital is closed at present, and the general health is very good. We had only one death last year."

When we consider the lives of those women previous to incarceration, and the excesses appertaining thereto, such a record bears testimony to the careful supervision exercised in this department.

The chapel is a large handsome apartment, the finest in the building. Religious services for both Protestants and Roman Catholics are conducted at stated times throughout the week, and on Sunday morning a Sunday school is held, when the inmates are brought in personal contact with Christian ladies, who labor earnestly to influence them for good. I have rarely seen a more impressive sight than these women and girls present when assembled for one of these services.

Swayed ever by impulse, a hymn, a text, a tender word will bring a softened look on many faces, and a quick tear even in many eyes, while good resolutions are made, too often to be broken by the evil influence of associates more hardened.

That reformation, thorough and complete, is possible has been proved in many instances; but it has been despite the association, and due rather to the personal efforts of the staff or kindly hearted philanthropists; for as one lady recently remarked: "No one knows what the women in the Mercer have to endure from their companions, whenever they endeavor to fight their way upward into a purer, higher life."

Max O'Rell on America.

When that eccentric and imaginative Frenchman who is known to the reading public as Max O Rell gave to the world his amusing skit upon English men and women entitled "John Bull and his Island," our American cousins found his book extremely entertaining and applauded his keen faculty for analysis and his discrimination as a critic. When subsequently he visited America and, with the traditional politeness of his nation, said all sorts of sugary things about Americans and their institutions, no one in the United States questioned his sagacity. But, alas, since his return to Europe, he has been lecturing in London on the United States, and it is now discovered that he is a very unsafe guide to follow, and that his exaggerations are so extravagant as to take away all value from his criticism. He declared that no man with any self-respect has anything to do with politics in the United States, and that if a senator accidentally gains admittance to a select entertainment the custom of the master of the house is to order that the silver as well as the hats and coats in the hall be carefully watched. In referring to the national predilection for profanity he tells of an American poker party on an English steamer of which each member laid down each card with a new and distinct oath. The same poker party a short time afterwards sang hymns and psalms

Prima Donnas and Their Jewels.

How does a lady singer become world-famed? asks a feuilleton writer in the Frankfurter Zeitung, and goes on to explain that their only road to fortune is to have some of their jewellery stolen from them. Bell-like intonation, harmony, a strong voice, acrobat-like technique, impressive expression, distinctness of pronunciation, lively action, and an attractive appearance ought to secure fame to a lady artiste. But only those will say this who have lived in hermitlike retirement, for in order to become famous a lady singer must at least have been robbed a few times. Just now a new candidate has presented herself as qualified for the part of the prima donna assoluta. Miss Sigrid Arnoldson, the attractive young Swedish girl, who has hitherto been like all other singing birds of the opera and the concert hall, has suddenly risen above them all, and her impressario sends out the notice in great delight—at last, at last, she, too, has been robbed. The object was, of course, a case with bracelets, earrings, etc., given to her by Empresses, Queens, and Princes. The impressario was nearly in despair when it appeared as if a row of pearls had been overlooked by the thieves; the clouds only vanished from his face when it was found that the pearls, too, were gone. A thief, remaining undiscovered, belongs as much to the outfit of a phenomally famous singer as does her indispensable rouge pot. She cannot do without a drawing-room Fra Diavolo. The lack of a perfect shape does not signify, the lack of a thief would be ruin. Adeline Patti has been robbed by night and by day, in Europe and America on shore and at sea, in hotels, and on railway trains. And Carlotta Patti and Christine Nelson and—but why mention names? An incredible amount of diamonds and jewels have disappeared in this way without ever turning up again. But the lady artistes are generous, compassionate' forgiving; they do not prosecute the thieves; they do not go to the police; they do not offer rewards. Perhaps they know that the gold in their throat can easily be coined, and that the rippling shakes can soon be changed into rows of pearls. They are easy-going, and soon forget their loss. But the wonder is that the august donors should still continue to present the singers with diamonds. They might have learned by experience that every precious stone they give to them is doomed to be stolen. A royal present to a lady artiste which does not get stolen has missed its object, and cases have indeed occurred where presents were stolen which were never given. The thieves belonging to the latter category are most favoured by the impressario. According to a rough estimate which a statistician has made concerning thefts of jewels from lady artistes, jewels of the value of £15,000,000 have been stolen from singers during the last decade, and however greatly the abilities of the police of countries may differ in other respects, they are alike all the world over in never troubling the thieves who victimize prima donnas. But there remains one consolation to the friends of the fair singers, and that is, that however frequently they are robbed of their jewels they are still ornamented with the same amount of jewellery even directly after the theft has occurred.—[Pall Mall Gazette.

How Beach beat Hanlan.

The special cable account of the Hanlan Beach race on Tuesday says:—

Beach won as he pleased. The race was not for the championship, but for a stake of $2,500 a side. Beach retired from champion some months ago, and Kemp, who recently

There are two distinct laundries, one being used for the Mercer and Central Prison washing; the second being reserved for family and contract washing.

As we entered the ironing room the chatter of the busy workers ceased, and they bent over their tables in silence.

"Do you allow conversation in working hours?" I enquired of the matron.

"In this department, yes," she answered. "The girls are constantly moving, and their remarks must necessarily be made in a tone loud enough for me to hear. Therefore, we know it to be harmless. It is not the loud talking that troubles us, but that which is carried on in low tone and which may be good or evil but most likely the latter.

Then we descended to the refractory ward.

"What forms of punishment do you adopt?" I enquired.

"Deprivation of privileges, solitary confinement in light cells, dark cells, and in extreme cases the dungeon. No, we never resort to corporal punishment in any form."

I inspected the dark cells and dungeon, and found them to be clean, dry and dimly lit, furnished with a straw pallet and coverlet.

"The dungeon, with bread and water diet, will generally reduce the most refractory to obedience," said the attendant, "but we have rarely to resort to these expedients. Months may go by without one punishment, and this ward is often vacant for a long time."

Upon further enquiry I found that the women are locked in their cells at half-past seven each evening. From that hour until five or six in the morning they are free from any supervision beyond that exercised by an overworked watchwoman who makes her long rounds through the extensive building, and who cannot make more than a brief and hurried visit two or three times during the night.

These thirty-three inmates, each with their varied experience in deadly evil, with the restraints of the work room removed, and the freedom of night and darkness about them, have unlimited opportunity to exchange confidences of the worst description without check or rebuke. Is this a desirable thing?

But this is but a small defect compared with the fact that there is absolutely no classification of the inmates. They mingle freely in recreation hours, work together, eat together in one large, gloomy dining room and sleep in adjoining cells.

For vagrancy, larceny, and assault, drunkenness and prostitution of a greater or less degree, these women are sentenced to mingle together for a period of months or years.

Many are first offenders, guilty only of minor evil, sentenced mayhaps by some county judge at the request of an anxious father who desires the reformation of his erring child. Many others, alas, are hardened criminals who have lived a life of the vilest sin that womanhood can compass.

Numbers of the inmates are young girls yet in their early teens, others are elderly women who have spent all their lives in and out of prison.

What good influences can the earnest-hearted staff exert that will not be more than counteracted by the evil resulting from indiscriminate association?

In looking over the latest annual report of the Mercer Reformatory for a record of the number of re commitments—a record which I did not find—a few particulars attracted my attention which may be—which certainly ought to be—of interest to the general public.

The total expenditure for the year ending in September, 1887, was $29,783.40, or close upon $30,000. The net revenue $3,595.93. Therefore, the institution costs over $26,000 yearly, the average daily cost per inmate being 57.98 cents, or $4.05 per week.

poker party on an English steamer of which each member laid down each card with a new and distinct oath. The same poker party a short time afterwards sang hymns and psalms for two hours. Max O'Rell declares that he has met men in other countries who swore and also, he is glad to say, who sang hymns, but America alone produces men who do both with equal facility.

Execution by Electricity.

The New York State law which provides that after January 1st next all executions for murder shall be performed by the agency of electricity is like to bring about a difficulty which was not contemplated when the legislation was passed. It was taken for granted that the new mode of death would be painless, and that there would be no ghastly preparations to add to the agony of the criminal. The Legislature forgot to specify in what manner the death-dealing shock should be applied, and it became necessary to refer the matter to a committee of electromedical experts to suggest a mode of operation. The recommendation made by this committee involves a number of mysterious preliminaries which will, in many cases, inflict agony worse than death itself. The criminal is to be strapped down upon a table or to a chair, then a metal helment is to be placed on his head, and metal points are to be put in contact with various parts of his body, while warm water is to be applied to his hair and head. So protracted and complicated a method of preparing the criminal has aroused much discussion, and exciting strong opposition to the change in the law. Unless some more simple means of electric application can be devised, it is doubtful whether the new law will be carried out.

Was Far Abune the Moon.

One fine moonlight night a Kilmannock farmer setting homeward from Bonhill, where he had sat too long and drunk too deep, had reached the burn near his house. Attempting to cross it by the stepping-stones—to effect which in safety required daylight or a steadier head than John's was on that night—he missed one stone, and came down splash into the burn. Unable to raise himself beyond his hands and knees, he looked down into the clear water, in which the moon was reflected, while the water streamed from his hair. At last he began to shout to his wife, "Marget? Marget!" The good woman hearing his cry, ran out, exclaiming, —"Oh, John, my John! Is that you? Whaur are ye, John?" "Whaur am I?" he rejoined; "I dinna ken, but I see I'm far aboon the mune." It was the same man of whom it is told, that on a moonlight night on his way home, overcome by drink, he had fallen or lain down to rest by the roadside, and had fallen asleep with his feet in a running stream. Awaking after a while, with the impression that he had reached home, and was in bed, he shouted—"Marget, bring anither pair o' blankets to pit on ma feet, and blaw out that cawnel."

Why?

Why suffer a single moment, when you can get immediate relief from internal or external pain by the use of Polson's Nerviline the great pain cure? Nerviline has never been known to fail. Try a 10 cent sample bottle. You will find it just as recommended. Neuralgia, toothache, cramps, headache, and all similar complaints disappear as if by magic when Nerviline is used. Large bottles 25 cents. Test bottles 10 cents, at druggists and country dealers.

Beach won as he pleased. The race was not for the championship, but for a stake of $2,500 a side. Beach retired from champion some months ago, and Kemp, who recently defeated Hanlan, is still champion.

To-day's race was arranged to give Hanlan a chance to win back some money he lost since he has been here, but he is more out of pocket than ever. A grand start was effected, the men striking water simultaneously, both going away at forty strokes to the minute and the pair rowed at a terrific rate. For the first 200 yards they kept with each other, but at the quarter-mile the pace moderated, Beach striking thirty-seven and Hanlan thirty-eight. Up Blaxland's point, which is a mile from the start, they kept close company, but thence Beach began to improve his position and, despite the Canadian's desperate efforts to hold him, not only secured the lead, but showed the way by a length passing Putney point, a mile and a half from commencement. On drawing clear, soon after leaving Gladesville, Beach sculled dead ahead, treating his opponent to a fair dose of backwash, Hanlan tiring rapidly. He maintained his advantage without much difficulty, ultimately winning very easily by about three lengths in 21. 15. It is reported that Hanlan will not go back to America but will go into business in Australia.

Caught Him Flirting.

They had just come out of a dime museum—a tall lank woman with knife-blade lips and an olive green complexion; the little old man with her was round-faced, blue-eyed and meek of manner. Hardly had they reached the pavement when the essence of vinegar hissed out:

"I seen ye, Abs'lom Kittson."

"Seen me what, Nancy?"

"Oh, I'd ask what! I tell ye I seen ye with my own livin' eyes!"

"Seen me what?"

"Seen you flurritin' with that tattoed woman. Oh, I did!"

"Good Lord, Nancy!"

"Oh, I seen you give her them peanuts. I seen ye!"

"Why Nance, I—"

"And I seen ye flurritin' with the fat woman. I seen ye give her the apple, Ab. Kittson."

"Why, Nance, I merely—"

"I had my eye on ye. I seen ye offer that albino gal a bite of your bolony sassinger, Ab. Kittson; an' I seen ye try to make up to that bearded woman—"

"Good land of—"

The Federation Question.

It is not the want of success of the appeal for federation which has produced the recent agitation in the ranks of opponents. On the contrary, it is the success of the enterprise and the practical steps recently taken to carry forward the work that has aroused this open antagonism. We would say to all loyal Methodists. Do not be disturbed by rumours about the alleged failure or obstruction of the movement. They are designed to create a feeling of doubt and uncertainty. With God's help we shall go steadily forward till we enter the new Victoria in the Queen's park to take our full share in moulding the intellectual life of this province. Let those who have subscribed arrange to pay their instalments as early as possible. The people of Toronto should now put forth a liberal and united effort to raise $50,000 additional to what they have promised.

"Chally," said Amarantha Jane, "I notice that your spirits recently seem to be bubbling over with happiness. I am glad to see it, but do tell me dear, what has caused it?" "I will," said Charley, as he encircled her waist and imprinted a kiss on her inviting lips. "You know for a while I was melancholy, blue as indigo—had no appetite, was bilious and dyspeptic, but the use of two bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has brought me out and I am 'bright as a button.' I feel like a new man now, Jane, name the day soon; there is more of this medicine at the drug store."

Wine, Women and Song," but the greatest of these is, "women.' "Wine is a mocker," and song is good to "sooth the savage," but women respond to every active power and sentiment of the human mind when in good health. But when afflicted with disease you will find them tantalizing, coquettish, cross, and hard to please. —We had this year a green Christmas certainly. During Monday night it commenced to rain and continued more or less all day Tuesday. As a consequence it was a dull Christmas, the people not having the heart to take their accustomed part in the festivities usual at this season of year.

On Friday last, the grist and saw mill of Mr. J. B. Gordon, (known as the Rathbun water mill,) at Kingsford, was totally distroyed by fire. Mr. Gordon, and others had been engaged all morning in the mill and at noon proceeded to the residence for dinner. While there the alarm was given, and by the time they reached the mill all was in flames. Just how it caught is not known, but it is supposed from a defective pipe. The loss will be about $6,000. Insured for $2,500. With commendable energy Mr. Gordon has already commenced operations towards rebuilding.

—Last week search warrants were issued and a raid made upon the hotels of Mrs. Wycott and Jno Babcock, of Odessa. The result wasthat at the former place five packages containing six bottlesofliquor and some beer were found. The packages were very ingeniously done up, to appear as though they were parcels of dry goods. At Babcock's whiskey and beer was also found. Both appeared before the Police Magistrate on two charges, that of keeping and selling liquor contrary to the Scott Act. Babcock's case was adjourned until tnis morning at 10 o'clock and Mrs. Wycott's for a week,and awarrant asked for her arrest.—On Tuesday Jas. McAvoy, of the Rankin House, was up for a first offence. The case was adjourned until 10 o'clock this morning.

--If there was a happy man in town on Wednesday morning it was Mr. H. V. Fralick, superintendent of the Western Methodist Sabbath School The evening previous, Christmas night, the annual Christmas gathering was held, and proved a decided success, much to his credit and that of his coadjutors.—Mr. and Mrs. Paul, Misses Shipman, Miss Marie Tilley and J. C. Drewry. Mr. Paul had charge of the training of the school for the choruses, Miss Shipman the primary class and Miss Tilley the wand exercise and kindergarten songs and each worked with a determination to make it a success and succeeded admirably. At about six o'clock the school assembled in the basement and were given a feast. Tables were set the full length of the room. The centre, and a short one across the top, was fitted up for the primary class, the chairs from the classroom being used. It was an exceedingly happy sight to see the little ones seated round the low tables enjoying the good things provided by the teachers and friends. Tea over the children marched upstairs and seated themselves in the centre seats of the church, some of the larger scholars at the top of each of the side seats. The remaining seats and gallery were occupied by those not members of the school who had assembled to enjoy the treat. The programme consisted of fourteen selections, the little ones acquitting themselves exceedingly well. From the opening to the close there was not the slightest hitch to mar the enjoyment. The song "Clap your Hands for joy" by the primary class ; the wand exercise and the kindergarten songs were highly appreciated. The piece that brought down the house was the recitation by Emma Downer, a little girl of six summers, who recited the most natural we have ever heard. During the evening the superintenant gave a short report, showing that the school was in a flourishing condition, the average attendance for 1888 being 299, an increase of 50 over the former year. The proceeds amounted to over $45, and this in addition to free admission to all members of the school. Before the distribution of the "fruit" Mrs. Freeman Lane was called to the platform and on behalf of her class presented with nicely bound copies of Scott and Byron's poetical works. The presentation was made by Wm. Vandewaters and a suitable address, (which we will give next issue,) read by Chas. Stevens. Leonard, who pumps the church organ, was remembered ; he was presented with a fur cap and muffler.

—Thursday night of last week the most successful bible society meeting ever held in Napanee took place in the Western Methodist church. It was presided over by His Honor Judge Wilkison, who in opening the meeting made an admirable address. There was a very good turnout, showing that the townspeople take quite an interest in the work performed by this organization. Able addresses were delivered by Revs. Messrs. Baker, Young and Chambers. A more extended report will be given next week.

The aim is "to unite all Christian Temperance people in an effort, to bring encouragement, arouse enthuiasm, and promote the interest of the the temperance cause." The meetings will be conducted by Messrs Dunnett & Stafford of Hamilton, who were so successful recently in Deseronto. As an earnest and effective speaker, Mr. Dunnett, the leader, has a wide reputation. The singing is also attractive.

—On the 11th of next month the citizens of Napanee will enjoy a treat, in the shape of an entertainment by the Hungarian Gipsy Band. They cannot be too highly spoken of as will be seen by the following from the Toronto Mail of Sep. 22nd: The Hungarian Gipsy Band, which has been delighting thousands of people at the Industrial Fair, gave a free concert at the Permanent Exhibition, under the auspices of the Press Club. Their fascinating and original performance gave extreme pleasure to those present. In their selections of Hungarian music the fire and abandon of their playing and the bizarre effects had a strangely exciting facination for their auditors. This was especially the gramme for the evening entertainment on the 16th Jan; also to attend to printing and advertising.

Messrs Doller and Bogart were instructed to wait on the county council and secure the annual grant of $25.

The meeting adjourned to the 16th of January at 10 a. m.

Western Methodist Church Anniversary.

A very pleasant gathering took place in the Western Methodist Church on Monday evening of last week, the occasion being the annual meeting of the congregation, at which reports of the different departments of the church work were given.

After singing and prayer, the pastor in his report said that the attendance at the class and prayer services had largely increased during the year, but the point to be noticed particularly was the internal growth of the church.

The president of the Young People's Association gave a most satisfactory report of the year's work, stating that the society never was larger nor more enthusiastic. The report was received and a motion passed expressing the thanks of the congregation for the work done.

After a selection from the choir, the superintendent of the Sunday School, H. V. Fralick, Esq, gave a verbal report of the growth of the school during the year. The average attendance had increased from 240 to 299, while the collection averaged over $4 a Sunday. Mr. Fralick, and the teachers and officers of the Sunday School, received a hearty vote of thanks from the congregation.

After another selection by the choir, some members of the congregation indulged in very complimentary remarks towards that body.

The Recording Steward and treasurer of the church, A. L. Morden, Esq., gave a very elaborate report of the finances, showing a marked increase in all of the funds of the church. That part of the treasurer's report dealing with the parsonage and repair fund was most gratifying. $4,000 had been subscribed, payable in two annual instalments. The expenditure was in the neighborhood of $5,000; of this amount $2394.00 had already been paid in being the first half of the subscriptions and the balance coming from other sources. Mr. Morden received a hearty vote of thanks for the report presented, it being evident that the congregation realized that the success achieved during the year was in no small measure due to the untiring energy of the treasurer.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! TO ALL

In wishing all our friends and customers a Happy and Prosperous New Year, we may just mention that our Protection Sale has been a grand success, and we have got our stock in finer shape than ever before at this season of the year.

Of course we still have a fine assortment of Winter Goods, which must be cleared out to make room for our early spring shipments, part of which are now on the road.

We are offering clearing prices on all kinds of Winter Goods, as balance of stock of Dress Goods, Tweeds, Mantle Cloths, Blankets, Flannels, Fancy Woolens, Clouds, etc., must be cleared out, and we are offering them at prices that will clear them out quickly.

Our Stock of Furs is badly demoralized. What we still have are A No. 1 goods, and we are bound to clear out every dollar's worth, if possible. Cost is not taken into consideration. No reasonable offer refused.

In our Millinery Department strange as it may appear, we are just as their fascinating and original performance gave extreme pleasure to those present. In their selections of Hungarian music the fire and abandon of their playing and the bizarre effects had a strangely exciting facination for their auditors. This was especially the case in their playing of the celebrated Racocey march. Plan of hall open at J. J. Perry's on Saturday.

—The annual Christmas gathering of the Eastern Methodist Sabbath School was held on Christmas night. There was a very fair attendance, though not as large as the entertainment called for. The cantata "Christmas Eve" was given by 100 voices, under the leadership of Mr. L. H. Bennett, who took considerable pains in training the children. Solos were nicely rendered by Ruby Chambers, Juanita Chambers, Lousie Daly and Eddie Knight; duets by Charlie Wilson and Melville Nixon, Carrie Williams and May Ward. Allen Davis as father Christmas delighted the audience. Myrtle Kennedy's rendition of kindergarten songs was excellent. Recitations were given by Jas Henry, Clarence Warner and Eddie Grange, and an address by Rev. A. B. Chambers. Confectionery, candies, Xmas cards, golden text rolls and pocket lessons for 1889 were distributed. Special presentations were made to Mrs, T. W. Casey and Miss Chambers by their respect ve classes. Proceeds $50.

Farmers' Institute.

NAPANEE, Dec. 15th 1888.

A meeting of the Lennox Farmers' Institute was held in the council chamber, the vice-president, A. J. Dunbar, in the chair.

After reading and adopting the minutes of the last meeting, the following communication, from R. N. Switzer, in reply to the resolution tendered him at last meeting, was read:

To the members of the Lennox Farmers' Institute:

Honored and Dear Sirs,—I beg to say in reply to your sympathetic address that I fully appreciate the very kind sentiments you are pleased to express, and desire to assure you that I am deeply grateful to have secured your confidence and esteem. You will readily believe that it is a great trial to me to be compelled to sever my connection with the scenes and relationship of early life and I assure you it is no small trial for me to resign my membership in your association and give up the active pursuit of agriculture in this, my native county. It is true I have endeavored in an unpretentious way to improve the live stock of this county, but I have been one of many farmers who have made a noble effort to improve the breed of our stock. Though I propose going from Ontario I shall ever cherish a warm interest in your welfare, and you will allow me to say that it is very desirable that the meetings of the Farmers' Institute should be more generally and regularly attended. I may have been as blame worthy as any other but if by some means the farmers generally could be induced to share in the business of the Institutes, it would more truly accomplish the purpose of its existence. Again thanking you for your kind wishes, I remain faithfully yours.

R. N. SWITZER.

Switzerville, Dec. 3, 1888.

A communication from the Agricultural College, giving notice that the 16th of January was the date fixed at which one or more of the professors would be present and deliver addresses on the following subjects, selected out of a number of subjects by the institute; said meeting to commence at 10 a. m. and continue throughout the day and evening.

Prof F. C. Greenside, V. S., day subjects, "Hereditary Diseases of the Horse" and "Horse Breeding in Ontario"; evening, "Disease Germs," of special interest to the people of the town.

D. Nicols, Esq., day subjects "Over Cropping, the Folly of It," and "Rotation of Crops"; evening, "Advice to Young Farmers,"

Mr. Allen Pringle, of Richmond, was requested to prepare a paper on the benefits and advantages of the silo and ensilage.

Messrs Dunbar, Doller and Bogart were appointed a committee to prepare a programme for the next meeting.

A vote of thanks was tendered the chairman for his able conduct in the chair, and the meeting adjourned.

Hearty Vote of Thanks.

At the annual meeting of the Methodist congregation held on Monday evening last, Rev. Mr. Morden received a hearty vote of thanks for the report presented, it being evident that the congregation realized that the success achieved during the year was in no small measure due to the untiring energy of the treasurer.

The pastor and congregation have reason to feel gratified at the years work. Much good has been done; both congregation and Sunday School have increased, the membership has been built up and the people feel that their efforts are being owned of God.

THE FARMERS' INSTITUTE.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS FOR 1889.

County Council Reform Dealt With.

The annual meeting of the above Institute was held in the council chamber on Saturday last at two o'clock. The gathering was much larger than usual, and an increased interest on the part of the farmers was clearly manifested.

After the reading of the minutes of the last meeting, Mr. C. W. Neville, of Ernesttown, was appointed associate auditor with Ira B. Hudgins, of Richmond, and they, after carefully examining the treasurer's books, submitted the following report:

RECEIPTS.

Balance on hand from last audit	$16 75
Government Grant	25 00
Member's subscriptions	16 20
Total	$57 95

DISBURSEMENTS.

Paid out as per vouchers	$20 10
Balance on hand	$37 85

On motion the auditors report was adopted.

The election of officers for 1889 was then proceeded with, the following being declared elected:

President—A. J. Dunbar.
Vice-President—Ira B. Hudgins.
Secretary—M. Bogart.
Treasurer—W. N. Doller.
Directors—U. Sills and W. N. Doller for Napanee; Ibri Sills and H. Vankoughnett for Richmond; C. W. Neville, B. E. Aylsworth and M. Empey for Ernesttown; Ira Pringle and J. C. Carscallen for North Fredericksburgh; Wm. Phippen for South Fredericksburgh, and F. C. Bogart for Adolphustown.

Auditors, Alexander Rose and M. Empey.

Allen Pringle and M. Bogart were appointed delegates to the Central Farmers' Institute, to be held in Toronto on February 5th, 6th and 7th. The delegates desired an expression of opinion on some of the matters to be dealt with by the Central Institute, and considerable discussion followed on the questions of statute labor, county council reform and doing away with township shows. It was finally moved by C. W. Neville, and seconded by H. Vankoughnett, that we as an Institute approve of the present system of statute labor, and instruct our delegates to the Central Institute to advocate its retention; that township shows be done away with, and that the number of representatives to the county council should be greatly diminished. Carried.

The secretary opened a discussion on the merits of ensilage and the silo as advocated in Mr. Pringle's paper at the publi meeting, stating that the whole was one of storage and feeding; t ists failed to find any more matter in ensilage than in drie the risk of preserving food in thi very great; if the temperture did not reach

A PROTEST

IN NORTH FREDERICKSBURGH.

Reeve Parks, the Subject of the Proceedings—Edward Baird Again.

For some days rumors have been current, that the election of Reeve Parks of North Fredericksburgh, was to be protested, but by many, the rumors, were not believed. Mr. Parks has fought many a hard battle in and for that township, and certainly deserves better treatment than is being given him at the hands of some of its electors. On Tuesday last, all doubt about proceedings being taken, were set at rest by Messrs Preston & Ruttan, as solicitors for the well known Edward Baird, applying for leave to introduce a motion to test the validity of the election of Irvine Parks as Reeve of North Fredericksburgh.

The motion will be returnable before Judge Wilkison, who will fix a time for the hearing of the evidence.

We understand that the usual charges of bribery and corruption are alleged.

Mr. Parks will fight the protest to the end, as he believes it to be started through spite and jealousy at his receiving eleven votes for the wardenship last week.

Since the above was written we have been informed that a mistake had been made in the proceedings, so that the papers have not yet been served. However, Mr. Ruttan is our authority for stating that the protest is under way.

A Sad Death.

We clip the following account of the sad death of Frank A. Brooks, from the Grayville (Illinois) Mercury, of January 12th. Mr. Brooks was the son of Mrs. John C. Martin, of Bell-rock, in the county of Addington, to whom our heartfelt sympathy goes out:

One of those sudden, fatal casualties causing a feeling of horror to steal into the hearts of strong men and bringing the living heedless human face to face with the certainty of death, was announced in the violent death of Frank A. Brooks at the new mill on last Monday morning at about nine o'clock.

Mr. Brooks was a foreman for Todds & Stanley of St. Louis, and was superintending the fitting up of the mill.

The heavy fly wheel of the engine was being lowered into the engine room through the door in front of the boiler by means of ropes and pulleys, and by the slipping of the wheel or some of the ropes it took an unexpected plunge and fell against the boiler, the rim catching the unfortunate man's head between it and the iron plates at the front of the boiler, literally crushing out his brains.

On motion the council went into committee of whole on the report, Mr. James Reid in the chair.

The committee rose and the chairman reported the adoption of the report with amendment.

On motion the report of the committee of whole was adopted.

Moved by Mr. Sweetnam, seconded by Mr. Jackson, that John Cheetham receive $1.50 per day for services as messenger this session. Carried.

A communication from the county registrar was read asking for a caretaker for the registry office.

On motion it was ordered filed.

Moved by Mr. Ball, seconded by Mr. Bryden, that the clerk be instructed to officially notify the several county officials that if they order any repairs or supplies of any nature or kind whatsoever, on account of the county, without an order from either the clerk or chairman of a committee, that they will be held personally responsible for the payments of the accounts for such repairs or supplies. Carried.

Mr. Lapum brought in the report of the finance committee.

On motion it was received and adopted.

On motion the minutes of to-day were read and confirmed.

On motion the council adjourned until the second Tuesday in March next.

Dr. Meacham on Prohibition,

Dr. Meacham, M. P. P. for Lennox, addressed the Prohibition meeting held in the Toronto Pavillon last Sunday afternoon.

The following account of his speech appeared in the Globe of Monday last: Dr. Meacham, a man also of medium build, with brown eyes and beard, a high forehead and spots of rosy red on either cheek, was the next speaker. His voice was earnest and his arguments emphasised by the movements of his hands as he, too, told of the struggles of Prohibiton along the concession lines of Lennox. Abstinence, he said, benefited not only the man who practised it, but his family and State. Abstinence was an individual gain. He pointed out many cruelties and absurdities in the present licensing law. He was willing to do all in his power to make the license law more stringent, and his opinion was, that for second or third offences against it, the offender's license ought to be taken away. He believed that the reverses of last year in Scott Act counties, would really advance Prohibition by showing people the difference between the results of the prohibitive and licensing laws. His idea was that the next move should be to pass a Provincial law and then go to the Dominion. It would, he thought, be a good thing to have two columns on the ballots at Dominion elections, in which electors might vote for or against Prohibition without regard to party. This would give the country's voice on the matter and keep it before the people.

Look Out For It.

If you are troubled with a cold or cough, however light the attack, look out for it, do not allow it to settle on the lungs: break up the cough by loosening the tough phlegm with Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam.

...was one of storage and feeding, ... ists failed to find any more matter in ensilage than in drie... the risk of preserving food in this ... very great; if the temperture did not reach 125° or exceed 122°, the product was sour, turpid food, and the danger of feeding mouldy ensilage was very great, and productive of disease to the stock; that he failed to discover this new truth, that the value of fodder is governed by the amount of water in it; that Prof. Robinson cautions the farmer against expecting too much from the silo, it does not add anything to the material perserved in it, and all it can do is to enable farmers to reduce the bulky part of the cattle feed.

Mr. Evans, of Ernesttown, produced a sample of ensilage just taken out of his silo, sweet, succilent and nutritious, and will at the next meeting, state his plan of silo and mode of preservation.

In the event of Mr. Pringle being unable to attend the Central, Mr. Neville was selected to go in his place.

In addition to receiving the report of the delegates at the next meeting, Mr. Neville was requested to prepare a paper on the breed of cattle best adapted for the general farmer in this county. Criticism will not be wanting, as much difference of opinion exists.

The meeting adjourned until Saturday February 23rd, at half-past one o'clock, in the council chamber, Napanee.

Better Than Ever.

It did seem as though the seedsmen outdid themselves last year in the line of elaborate catalogues, but here comes Vick's Floral Guide for 1889, from Rochester N. Y., better than all previous issues. "Better" hardly expresses it—rather, we should say, far superior. It has been changed in every respect; new cuts, new type, enlarged in size (opening like an old fashioned singing book); contains three elegant lithographs (8x10¾ inches) of Roses, Geraniums and Melon and Tomato; besides a very fine plate of the late James Vick and his three sons who now own and manage this large business. These features must make the Floral Guide valuable to their many thousands of customers in this country.

We also notice that Vick returns to the plan started by the founder of the business years ago, of offering cash prizes at the State Fair. One would think they were a little out of their heads to offer to the public such a work as the Guide free, for that is what it amounts to, when they say it will be sent on receipt of fifteen cents, and that a certificate good for fifteen cents worth of seed, will be returned with the Guide.

Napanee Cemetery Company—Annual Meeting.

The shareholders of the Napanee cemetery company met in the council chamber on Monday afternoon at two o'clock. The following were elected directors for the year 1889:

A. L. Morden, M. W. Pruyn, Geo. Cliff, Wm Miller, James Perry, Edward Roberts, R. G. Wright, P. Embury, John Webster.

At a subsequent meeting of the directors, George Cliff was elected President, A. L. Morden, Vice-President, and John Webster, Secretary-Treasurer.

On motion George Cliff, James Perry and John Webster were appointed a committee of management for the ensuing year.

A. L. Morden and P. Embury were appointed auditors, after which the meeting adjourned.

"ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH."

"Come here, Susanna, and tell me wha has been buried here. It looks like the tai of a dog."

She might have added, "Of my dog." Murder, it seems, will out. By some strange hance, the grave that covered the mortal emains of Chowder had been disturbed, nd the black tail of the dog was sticking at.

"What can it be?" said I, with an air of erfect innocence. "Shall I call Jenny, and ig it up?"

"Oh, no, my dear; it has a shocking smell, but it does look very much like Chowder's tail."

"Impossible! How could it come among my peas?"

"True. Besides, I saw Chowder, with my own eyes, yesterday, following a team; and George C—— hopes to recover him for me."

"Indeed! I am glad to hear it. How these mosquitoes sting. Shall we go back to the house?'

While we returned to the house, John, who had overheard the whole conversation, hastily disinterred the body of Chowder, and placed him in the same mysterious grave with Tom and the pig.

Moodie and his friend finished logging-up the eight acres which the former had cleared the previous winter; besides putting in a crop of peas and potatoes, and an acre of Indian corn, reserving the fallow for fall wheat, while we had the promise of a splendid crop of hay off the sixteen acres that had been cleared in 1834. We were all in high spirits, and everything promised fair, until a very trifling circumstance again occasioned us much anxiety and trouble, and was the cause of our losing most of our crop.

Moodie was asked to attend a bee, which was called to construct a corduroy-bridge over a very bad piece of road. He and J. E—— were obliged to go that morning with wheat to the mill, but Moodie lent his yoke of oxen for the work.

The driver selected for them at the bee was the brutal M——y, a man noted for his ill-treatment of cattle, especially if the animals did not belong to him. He gave one of the oxen such a severe blow over the loins with a handspike that the creature came home perfectly disabled, just as we wanted his services in the hay-field and harvest.

Moodie had no money to purchase, or even to hire, a mate for the other ox; but he and John hoped that by careful attendance upon the injured animal he might be restored to health in a few days. They conveyed him to a deserted clearing, a short distance from the farm, where he would be safe from injury from the rest of the cattle; and early every morning we went in the canoe to carry poor Duke a warm mash, and to watch the progress of his recovery.

An! ye who revel in this world's wealth, how little can you realize the importance which we, in our poverty, attached to the life of this valuable animal! Yes, it even became the subject of prayer, for the bread for ourselves and our little ones depended great[illegible] his recovery.—We were doom[illegible]

This was something gained, and off we set.

It was so dark in the bush, that our dim candle looked like a solitary red spark in the intense surrounding darkness, and scarcely served to show us the path.

We went chatting along, talking over the news of the evening, Hector running on before us, when I saw a pair of eyes glare upon us from the edge of the swamp, with the green, bright light emitted by the eyes of a cat.

"Did you see those terrible eyes, Moodie?" and I clung, trembling, to his arm.

"What eyes?" said he, feigning ignorance. "It's too dark to see anything. The light is nearly gone, and, if you don't quicken your pace, and cross the tree before it goes out, you will, perhaps, get your feet wet by falling into the creek."

"Good Heavens! I saw them again; and do just look at the dog."

Hector stopped suddenly, and, stretching himself along the ground, his nose resting between his forepaws, began to whine and tremble. Presently he ran back to us, and crept under our feet.

Just at that critical moment the wick of the candle flickered a moment in the socket, and expired. We were left, in perfect darkness, alone with the bear—for such we supposed the animal to be.

My heart beat audibly; a cold perspiration was streaming down my face, but I neither shrieked or attempted to run. I don't know how Moodie got me over the creek. One of my feet slipped into the water, but expecting, as I did every moment, to be devoured by master Bruin, that was a thing of no consequence. My husband was laughing at my fears, and every now and then he turned towards our companion, who continued following us at no great distance, and gave him an encouraging shout. Glad enough was I when I saw the gleam of the light from our little cabin window shine out among the trees; and, the moment I got within the clearing I ran, without stopping until I was safely within the house. John was sitting up for us, nursing Donald. He listened with great interest to our adventure with the bear, and thought that Bruin was very good to let us escape without one affectionate hug.

"Perhaps it would have been otherwise had he known, Moodie, that you had not only killed his good lady, bnt were dining sumptuously off her carcass every day."

The bear was determined to have something in return for the loss of his wife. Several nights after this, our slumbers were disturbed, about midnight, by an awful yell, and old Jenny shook violently at our chamber door.

"Masther, masther, dear!—Get up wid you this moment, or the bear will desthroy the cattle intirely."

Half asleep, Moodie sprang from his bed, seized his gun, and ran out. I threw my large cloak round me, struck a light, and followed him to the door. The moment the latter was unclosed, some calves that we were rearing rushed into the kitchen, closely followed by the larger beasts, who came bellowing headlong down the hill pursued by the bear.

It was a laughable scene, as shown by that paltry tallow, candle. Moodie, in his night-shirt, taking aim at something in the darkness, surrounded by the terrified animals; old Jenny, with a large knife in her [illegible]olding on to the white skirts of her [illegible]garment, making outcry loud enough [illegible] away all the wild bea[illegible] the [illegible] a state of nudity.

His wretched followers with the hope of gain,
Feel in his bosom the immortal fire
That bound a Wallace to his country's cause,
And bade the Thracian shepherd cast away
Rome's galling yoke; while the astonished world—
Rapt into admiration at the deed—
Paused, ere she crush'd, with overwhelming force,
The man who fought to win a glorious grave?

The long-protracted harvest was at length brought to a close. Moodie had procured another ox from Drummer, by giving a note at six months date for the payment; and he and John E—— were in the middle of sowing their fall crop of wheat, when the latter received a letter from the old country, which conveyed to him intelligence of the death of his mother, and of a legacy of two hundred pounds. It was necessary for him to return to claim the property, and though we felt his loss severely, we could not, without great selfishness, urge him to stay. John had formed an attachment to a young lady in the country, who, like himself, possessed no property. Their engagement, which had existed several years, had been dropped, from its utter hopelessness, by mutual consent. Still the young people continued to love each other, and to look forward to better days, when their prospects might improve so far that E—— would be able to purchase a bush-farm, and raise a house, however lowly, to shelter his Mary.

He, like our friend Malcolm, had taken a fancy to buy a part of our block of land, which he could cultivate in partnership with Moodie without being obliged to hire, when the same barn, cattle, and implements would serve for both. Anxious to free himself from the thraldom of debts which pressed him sore, Moodie offered to part with two hundred acres at less than they cost us, and the bargain was to be considered as concluded as soon as the money was forthcoming.

It was a sorrowful day when our young friend left us; he had been a constant inmate in the house for nine months, and not one unpleasant word had ever passed between us. He had rendered our sojourn in the woods more tolerable by his society, and sweetened our bitter lot by his friendship and sympathy. We both regarded him as a brother, and parted with him with sincere regret. As to old Jenny, she lifted up her voice and wept, consigning him to the care and protection of all the saints in the Irish calender.

For several days after John left us, a deep gloom pervaded the house. Our daily toil was performed with less cheerfulness and alacrity; we missed him at the evening board, and at the evening fire; and the children asked each day, with increasing earnestness, when dear E—— would return.

Moodie continued sowing his fall wheat. The task was nearly completed, and the chill October days were fast verging upon winter, when towards the evening of one of them he contrived—I know not how—to crawl down from the field at the head of the hill, faint and pale, and in great pain. He had broken the small bone of his leg. In dragging, among the stumps, the heavy machine (which is made in the form of the letter V, and is supplied with large iron teeth) had hitched upon a stump, and being swung off again by the motion of the oxen, had come with great force against his leg. At first he was struck down, and for some time was unable to rise; but at length he contrived to unyoke the team, and crawled partly on his hands and knees down the clearing.

What a sad, melancholy evening that was! Fortune seemed never tired of playing us some ugly trick. The hope which had so the few acres of wheat we had to reap were close to the barn, and we carried the sheaves thither by hand; old Jenny proving an invaluable help, both in the harvest and hayfield.

Still, with all these misfortunes, Providence watched over us in a signal manner. We were never left entirely without food. Like the widow's cruise of oil, our means, though small, were never suffered to cease entirely. We had been for some days without meat, when Moodie came running in for his gun. A great she-bear was in the wheat field at the edge of the wood, very busily employed in helping to harvest the crop. There was but one bullet, and a charge or two of buckshot, in the house; but Moodie started to the wood with the single bullet in his gun, followed by a little terrier dog that belonged to John E——. Old Jenny was busy at the wash-tub, but the moment she saw her master running up the clearing and knew the cause, she left her work, and snatching up the carving knife, ran after him, that, in case the bear should have the best of the fight, she would be there to help "the masther." Finding her shoes incommode her, she flung them off, in order to run faster. A few minutes after came the report of the gun, and I heard Moodie halloo to E——, who was cutting stakes for a fence in the wood. I hardly thought it possible that he could have killed the bear, but I ran to the door to listen. The children were all excitement, which the sight of the black monster, borne down the clearing upon two poles, increased to the wildest demonstrations of joy. Moodie and John were carrying the prize, and old Jenny, brandishing her carving-knife, followed in the rear.

The rest of the evening was spent in skinning, and cutting up, and salting the ugly creature, whose flesh filled a barrel with excellent meat, in flavor resembling beef, while the short grain and juicy nature of the flesh gave to it the tenderness of mutton. This was quite a Godsend, and lasted us until we were able to kill two large fat hogs, in the fall.

A few nights after, Moodie and I encountered the mate of Mrs. Bruin, while returning from a visit to Emilia, in the very depth of the wood.

We had been invited to meet our friend's father and mother, who had come up on a short visit to the woods; and the evening passed away so pleasantly that it was near midnight before the little party of friends separated. The moon was down. The wood, through which we had to return, was very dark, the ground being low and swampy, and the trees thick and tall. There was in particular, one very ugly spot, where a small creek crossed the road. This creek could only be passed by foot-passengers scrambling over a fallen tree, which in a dark night, was not very easy to find.

I begged a torch of Mr. ——; but no torch could be found. Emilia laughed at my fears; still, knowing what a coward I was in the bush of a night, she found about an inch of candle, which was all that remained from the evening's entertainment. This she put into an old lanthorn.

"It will not last you long; but it will carry you over the creek."

... masther, dear! don't timpt the ill-conditioned crathur wid charging too near; think of the wife and the childher. Let me come at the rampaging baste, an' I'll stick the knife into the heart of him."

Moodie fired. The bear retreated up the clearing, with a low growl. Moodie and Jenny pursued him some way, but it was too dark to discern any object at a distance. I, for my part, stood at the open door, laughing until the tears ran down my cheeks, at the glaring eyes of the oxen, their ears erect, and their tails carried gracefully on a level with their backs, as they stared at me and the light, in blank astonishment. The noise of the gun had just roused John E—— from his slumbers. He was no less amused than myself, until he saw that a fine yearling heifer was bleeding, and found, upon examination, that the poor animal, having been in the claws of the bear, was dangerously, if not mortally hurt.

"I hope," he cried, "that the brute has not touched my foal!" I pointed to the black face of the filly peeping over the back of an elderly cow.

"You see, John, that Bruin preferred veal; there's your 'horsey,' as Dunbar calls her, safe, and laughing at you."

Moodie and Jenny now returned from the pursuit of the bear. E—— fastened all the cattle into the back yard, close to the house. By daylight he and Moodie started in chase of Bruin, whom they tracked by his blood some way into the bush, but here he entirely escaped their search.

THE BEARS OF CANADA.

Oh! BEAR me from this savage land of BEARS,
For 'tis indeed UNBEARABLE to me;
I'd rather cope with vilest worldly cares,
Or writh with cruel sickness of the sea.
Oh! BEAR me to my own BARE land of hills,*
Where I'd be sure brave BARE-legg'd lads to see—
BEAR cakes, BARE rocks, and whiskey stills,
And BARE-legg'd nymphs to smile once more on me.

I'd BEAR the heat, I'd BEAR the freezing air
Of equatorial realm or Arctic Sea,
I'd sit all BARE at night, and watch the Northern BEAR,
And bless my soul that he was far from me.
I'd BEAR the poor-rates, tithes, and all the ills
John Bull must BEAR, (who takes them all, poor sinner!
As patients do when forced to gulp down pills,
And water-gruel drink in lieu of dinner).
I'd BEAR the BARENESS of all barren lands
Before I'd BEAR the BEARISHNESS of this;
BARE head, BARE feet, BARE legs, BARE hands,
BEAR everything, but want of social bliss.
But should I die in this drear land of BEARS,
Oh! ship me off, my friends, discharge the sable wearers,
For if you don't, in spite of priests and prayers,
The BEARS will come, and eat up corpse and BEARERS.

CHAPTER XX.—THE OUTBREAK.

Can a corrupted stream pour through the land
Health-giving waters? Can the slave, who lures partly on his hands and knees down the clearing.

What a sad, melancholy evening that was! Fortune seemed never tired of playing us some ugly trick. The hope which had so long sustained me seemed about to desert me altogether; when I saw him on whom we all depended for subsistence, and whose kindly voice ever cheered us under the pressure of calamity, smitten down helpless, all my courage and faith in the goodness of the Divine Father seemed to forsake me, and I wept long and bitterly.

The next morning I went in search of a messenger, to send to Peterborough for the doctor; but though I found and sent the messenger, the doctor never came. Perhaps he did not like to incur the expense of a fatiguing journey, with small chance of obtaining a sufficient remuneration

Our dear sufferer contrived with assistance, to bandage his leg; and after the first week of rest had expired, he amused himself with making a pair of crutches, and in manufacturing Indian paddles for the canoe, axe-handles, and yokes for the oxen. It was wonderful with what serenity he bore this unexpected affliction.

Buried in the obscurity of the woods, we knew nothing, heard nothing of the political state of the country, and were little aware of the revolution which was about to work a great change for us and for Canada.

The weather continued remarkably mild. The first great snow, which for years has ordinarily fallen between the 10th and 15th of November, still kept off. November passed on; and as all our firewood had to be chopped by old Jenny during the lameness of my husband, I was truly grateful to God for the continued mildness of the weather.

On the 4th of December—that great day of the outbreak—Moodie was determined to take advantage of the open state of the lake to carry a large grist up to Y——'s mill. I urged upon him the danger of a man attempting to manage a canoe in rapid water, who was unable to stand without crutches; but Moodie saw that the children would need bread, and he was anxious to make the experiment.

Finding that I could not induce him to give up the journey, I determined to go with him. Old Wittals, who happened to come down that morning, assisted in placing the bags of wheat in the little vessel, and helped to place Moodie at the stern. With a sad, forboding spirit, I assisted to push off from the shore.

Currency in Venezuela.

In Venezuela all manner of makeshifts have been resorted to for supplying a "circulating medium." In Guanta, for example, the peaple have absolutely no money, and when they wish to purchase a few necessaries they steal cocoanuts by "the dark of the moon," and hand them over to the traders in exchange for the supplies they require. This free-and-easy custom became so universal and alarming that, in order to protect the few who raise the fruit, the Alcaldi of the District of Guanta was obliged to issue a decree which probably has not a parallel in financial circles. He has lately prohibited the use of cocoanuts as money, and threatened with condign punishment all traders who may receive them as such.

So unsatisfactory is the cable communication with Australia that the English papers announce the laying of a new line over part of the distance as the service is constantly interrupted by volcanic eruptions and other causes. The new line will be over a thousand miles in length. The repeated troubles over these old routes all tell in favor of the Pacific project, in which Canada is interested.

YOUNG FOLKS.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Speak a kind word when you can—
  Kind words cost but little,
This is far the better plan—
  Human hearts are brittle;
Life is all too short for strife—
  Peace and love are golden,
For they serve to lengthen life—
  So say sages olden!

Let us lend a helping hand
  To a weary brother,
Are we not a pilgrim band
  Bound to one another?
Our reward shall greater be
  When we get to heaven,
If to duty faithfully
  We have daily striven!

Life to us is like a school
  Where our good behavior
Should be as "the golden rule"
  Taught us by our Saviour:—
"Do to others as you would
  That they should do to you;"
Then shall you be truly good,
  And life's regrets be few!

THE HOUSE THAT HILDA BUILT

It was one summer day, and the sun was just going down. Hilda Benson—she was twelve years old—believes she will always remember it, because all the werld around her was very beautiful the few moments she stood looking at the wide sea and the crimson-tinted clouds. Sky Island, on a headland of which she stood, seemed to have drifted away off on the bosom of the ocean to a place where there was never any noise except the lapping of the sea on the rocks, an' the flapping of the fishermen's sails.

"O Tom!" she said to her brother, clasping her hands impulsively, "O Tom! I think it is splended, and I am just as happy as I can be. I wish I could do something good."

Tom was stretched out on the grass reading a sea tale. He looked up at her wonderingly.

"Be a good little girl then, and go get me an apple," he suggested. He always called her a little girl because he was fourteen years old.

"I wish I could do something good," she continued, "something I could think about the last thing before I go to sleep, when I wake in the night, and when I get up in the morning."

When Hilda recalls that beautiful afternoon three years ago she remembers very well how it made her feel, and what she said. And she can tell an interesting story about what happened afterwards, and what she eally did do.

She and her brother had come to sky Island with their Aunt Margaret to pass the summer. But she had no idea that visiting that out-of-the-way place would ever make any difference in the lives of three small boys among the fishermen. She was a generous little girl with the money her father and Aunt Margaret often gave her; she would have given those boys a share of that money to help them buy better clothes, for they looked very poor compared with the boys she was was used to, and she would have helped them in any way she could. But she would have been very much surprised if any one had told her how much she had to give that was not money.

It came about in this way. Seth Cropper and I will get our Aunt Margaret to buy some books for you to study."

Seth and Andy and Piper went to work with a will to fix the old boat-house so it might be a place good enough for Hilda to enter. They swept and scrubbed it clean. Then they built at one end a seat with a canopy of hemlock boughs for her to sit on. Two or three of the fishermen lent them lanterns to hang up on the rafters to light the place. About dark, an old fisherman named Todgers, with a wooden leg, looked in to see what the boys were doing.

"Seems to me you lads have tackled a new reckonin', and are on a new tack, hey?" he said, rubbing his stubby chin.

"Well, I guess so, uncle," Seth answered. "We're pointing for something better'n a school of fish just now."

"You take my advice, and don't reef any sail whilst there's a fair wind." Uncle Todgers went on. "Just keep yourself braced right up for every whiff you can get."

Tom and Hilda were on hand by the time they were expected. They brought reading-books and spelling-books with them, and began as though they had kept school all their lives. But they had never attempted to teach before, and Tom soon discovered that it took a great deal of patience. Seth and Piper and Andy tugged at the short sentences in the readers for two hours harder than they had ever worked at anything.

"If we can only succeed in making them read the way we can read, Tom, I shall be ever so happy," said Hilda, when they had finished the evening, and were going across the Island in the moonlight.

"We'll try," Tom answered. "And I think they ought not to forget you in a hurry, if we do. I shouldn't have thought of teaching them, Hilda, if it had not been for you'

"You are good to help me, Tom," Hilda replied, "and I shall not forget you all my life."

Seth and Andy and Piper stood still and silent, watching them until they had disappeared in the shadow of thick trees that screened the moonlight.

"Look here, fellows," said Seth, soberly; "I move that we make a compact right on this spot this moment to get those books so as we can read them straight from cover to cover before that little girl and her brother leave the Island."

"So be it," said Piper solemnly. I'm agreed."

"So say we all of us," asserted Andy. And they struck hands.

It was the middle of June when the school was begun, and it was the last of September when Aunt Margaret signified to Tom and Hilda that itwas time to go back to their city home. They had taught the three boys more than three months and they could all read. Seth could even write a little, and he promised to write a letter to Hilda every week to let her know how they progressed. Hilda looked for the letters with eagerness; and three or four times she got a long letter which Seth and Piper and Andy had written together, telling all the news at the Island. Once they wrote that a great snow storm had buried the Island in snow. Another time they told about an illustrated book which Seth had received from a gentleman who sent him the five-dollar bill, and what fun they had had reading it together during the winter evenings. In the spring there came a letter that had important news. Sky Island was going to have a regular school-house built, like the one at the village on the mainland. Seth and Piper and Andy, with Uncle Todger's help, had brought the thing to pass.

"That is a surprise!" said Aunt Margaret.

"I would not have believed they could do it," Tom added.

"Oh, I am so glad!" said Hilda.

Resolves for

Of course we all wan[t] resolution on New Yea[r] break them before the wee[k] of us do; but if we look in[to] closely, we will find that we do not make them in the right spirit when they are so easily broken. In the first place, we must study ourselves, our faults and limitations, and then make such resolutions as we see will be most helpful to us to correct these, looking to One who alone is able to help us keep them.

As I am writing to women, I propose to tell them of a code made by a friend of mine, n January, 1887. She is a farmer's wife, with several children, and was a very Martha among women, "careful and troubled about many things." I will quote from her letter, which may help some of you:

"I was fast working myself into that narrow bed which must form our last rest. It was one eternal round of washing, ironing, cleaning, sewing, sweeping and baking. One day when I was fluting the ruffles of my little girls' aprons, I happened to reflect upon the probable future of my little ones if I should be taken sick or die. Probably I was then overtired, for one or other of these catastrophes seemed to be at that moment imminent. That night after I went to bed I framed in my mind a set of resolutions which I afterward wrote out. They were, that I would lie down daily, if only for fifteen minutes. That one afternoon in the week, in winter at least, I would devote to the exchange of ideas with the outer world—I would see some friend, either in her home or mine. That three evenings in the week, in winter at least, I would read aloud, with, or without, the children—that is, sometimes for their benefit, and sometimes for my own.

"Now, in order to do this, the work must be lessened somewhere. First, I left off every ruffle and tuck from garments, little and big. This saved both sewing and ironing. Flannels, plain underclothing (and we soon had no other) were brought from the line on wash day, as soon as dry, folded neatly and hung on the horse to air without taking an iron to them at all. I have since learned that it is considered better not to iron sheets, as it takes off the sweet smell of newly washed linen. If such things are hung up straight, and then not jammed in a wad in a basket to lie over night preparatory to 'sprinkling,' there are few wrinkles that cannot be rubbed out with your two hands. Wash day remained a necessary evil, but I saved washing in every way possible. Little squares of white oilcloth were laid under the children's plates, and in summer when the men were afield, and clothing was necessarily more soiled, a long strip of this material was laid upon either side of the table. Pies, which had been on our table daily, became a rarity; cake, still more rare. Think of the saving of labor that this sacrifice meant, and my husband says it has been no sacrifice, but that on the contrary he thinks doing without these dainties has given him a new lease of life. Baking day, which once with its doughnuts and pies had been my busiest day, now became my day of leisure—comparative leisure, for I still do not luxuriate in idleness. The children are merrier and happier, because I can give them more time. My husband is more pleased, because he says I do not now look overworked, and, altogether, we are satisfied with my resolutions."

My friend could not easily have kept these resolutions without the co-operation of her husband, and, in the name of overburdened womanhood, I ask the husbands who read the "American Agriculuralist" to be in this matter a helpmeet to their wives.—[Alice Chittenden.

But she would have been very much surprised if any one had told her how much she had to give that was not money.

It came about in this way. Seth Cropper had been expecting a letter every day since Tom and Hilda had been rowed over to the Island by him. He had told them all about it, and talked about it and talked of it every time they went to the post-office on the mainland in his boat. That afternoon after Hilda had watched the sun go down, Seth came up from the wharf with the letter in his hand.

"It's come," he said. "Here it is, sure's I'm born."

"Oh! I'm ever so glad," Hilda answered

"What does he say?" asked Tom closing his book.

The letter was from a gentleman who had recently been visiting the Island in a yacht, and it contained a crisp five-dollar bill. Seth unfolded the letter, and showed them the money; but he grew very red and confused when Tom asked again what the gentleman had written.

"You read it aloud, Miss Hilda," he requested. "I guess you can read it better'n I can."

Hilda read it. The gentleman said he sent the money to help Seth get a new boat. He advised him to be a better boy than he had been, to stop swearing, and to try very hard to learn to read and write.

"Why, I'll teach you to read, if you want me to!" said Hilda, the moment she had finishsd reading.

"Will you? Do you really mean it in solemn earnest?" Seth asked, pleased and redder than ever. "I'll do anything to learn, if you will, and I'll row you over to the village for nothing whenever you say so."

Hilda said of course she meant what she said, and she would agree to teach him every day.

Seth had never felt so ashamed of his ignorance as he did now. That night he found a couple of his cronies, Piper Smith and Andy Tarbox, down on the wharf fishing by the light of a brush fire. He confided to them that the little city girl was going to teach him reading and writing, and he meant to turn over a new leaf in the future.

"Look here, Andy; perhaps she'll teach you and Piper, if you ask her," Seth said in a burst of enthusiasm.

"I wouldn't dare to ask her," said Andy.

"Nor" I, put in Piper. "They ain't like us, that little city girl and her brother. He's awful big feeling, that fellow."

"You just, wait, then," said Seth, "and I'll ask her myself."

"We might take the old boat-house up here, put in some benches, and make a regular school-house of it, hey?" suggested Andy.

"That's what I'll tell her," Seth declared. "Mebbe she knows we never have any school on the Island, summer or winter, and have to go over to the mainland for everything we learn."

"We'd know how to read and write like other folks, of course, if 'twasn't for that," said Piper; "if we didn't have to go to the mainland and get thrashed by those village fellows."

"Well, I'll ask her, anyhow," Seth declared again.

And he did ask her the first chance he got the next day. He explained that Andy and Piper did not know even as much as he himself, and that they were very anxious to share his advantages. To his surprise, not only Hilda seemed glad to help him and the other boys, but Tom, who was rather "stuck up" said he would help also.

"We'll teach the three of you down in the boat-house every evening after you get through your work," said Tom. "Hilda garet.

"I would not have believed they could do it," Tom added.

"Oh, I am so glad!" said Hilda.

When Uncle Todgers found out from Seth that the little city girl and her brother were coming to the Island to pass another summer, he declared that the new school-house should be dedicated the day they arrived. All the fishermen on the island agreed with him, and the carpenters and painters made haste to get the little building completed.

One bright June morning Tom and Hilda stood on the shore of the mainland rather bewildered. There was a large fishing-smack, gayly decorated with flags, waiting to take them and their aunt over to the Island. Seth, Piper, and Andy were on board, and so was Uncle Todgers. Everybody was delighted to see them, and the boys were dressed specially for the occasion.

"There's going to be a big time this afternoon," Seth whispered to Tom.

"Going to have a festival," whispered Piper, slyly. "Everybody's folks has got something ready,—cake, mince-pies, ice-cream, everything."

By three o'clock the brand-new little school-house was crowded. It looked as though every soul on the Island was on hand. Uncle Todgers sat on the platform with Tom and Hilda on his right and left. As soon as it could be made quiet, he stood up on his wooden leg, and made a speech, telling everybody how much they owed to Tom and his little sister.

"Mebbe the little girl didn't know how much she was doing when she did what she could to help these boys," he said; "and mebbe the girls and boys here don't know what good they can do hereafter by using what they learn for the good of others; but I want everybody to take notice from the example that's now before them."

Tom and Hilda hardly knew what to say. Before they went to bed that night they stole out, went to the cliff, and took another look at the schohool-use to make sure it was a a fact.

Talking Dolls.

And now Mr. Edison has invented a genuine talking doll. He calls it a Dollphone He puts a little phonograph with a clock-work accompaniment, in the doll's back, and by pressing a spring the doll will say:

"I love you, mamma; I love you dearly, mamma; but I am tired and sleepy now. Please put me in my little bed," or something else equally astonishing. The reporter of the Chicago "Tribune" visited Mr. Edison and saw these wonderful dolls. He says:

"Mr. Edison wound up a brunette doll, with jet black curls and sparkling brown eyes. The doll started off at a brisk rate with the following:

Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
How I wonder what you are,
Up above the world so high,
Like a diamond in the sky.

Another doll-baby sang in a sweet, childish treble "Rock-a by Baby on the Tree Top" all the way through with good expression and without a false note. She sang it quite loudly, too, so that any one could have heard her across a moderate-sized room. Still another sang a pretty German song. It is so constructed that phonograph cylinders are interchanged, and new sets of sentences may frequently be introduced into the toy's talking machine.

There is a good field for missionaries at Tuscumbia, Miller county, Missouri, where there has not been a church building of any kind in 40 years.

womannood, I ask the husbands who read the "American Agriculuralist" to be in this matter a helpmeet to their wives.—[Alice Chittenden.

SMALLPOX SCARE.

Cases all Round Detroit—A Student at Ann Arbor Down.

DETROIT, Jan. 26.—Health Officer Duffield says there is smallpox all round Detroit, and the infection could easily be carried in paper money. He asked for authority to request the banks to have their tellers vaccinated. Comptroller Moran knew of a case of infection from paper money. The health officer was given power to notify the banks of the danger.

ANN ARBOR, Jan. 26.—A student in the School of Pharmacy in the university named Dally had a light attack of smallpox and has been removed to the pest house. He was vaccinated in New York the same day he was exposed, so his attack will not be serious. The case is making quite a scare, however, and everybody is getting vaccinated.

LANSING, Jan. 26.—Dr. Baker says that the State Board of Health has information of outbreaks of smallpox at seven different places in the State—Allis township, Presque Isle county, one case; Deerfield township, Lenawee county, five cases; Dundee, one case; Azalia, Monroe county, fourteen cases; Lansing, two cases; Detroit, two cases; Cheboygan, three cases.

Is Stanley Alive?

Henry M. Stanley, accompanied by nine hundred men, started from Yambuza, on the Congo, on the 23d of June, 1887, for the relief of Emin Bey. His objective point was Wadelai. The distance in a straight line is about 560 miles, but the region being unknown and the impediments frequent the journey probably aggregated 750 miles. Stanley expected to make twelve miles a day, and join Emin in August, and be back in November. This was rather too sanguine, however, for the average rate of Stanley's march in 1876, from Zanzibar to Victoria Nyanza, was only six miles a day. But, even with the full allowance for interruption, a long time has elapsed. One year and six months have gone and his fate is unknown.

Is Stanley dead? The question is the subject of a valuable symposium in the December number of the "North American Review." The writers are Lord Wolseley, President Daly, of the American Geographical Society, and James M. Hubbard and Dr. Franz Boaz, two authorities on African exploration. General Wolseley says, "I feel convinced that he has reached Emin Pasha." He further declares that the circumstances "strengthen the assumption that Stanley and the White Pasha are one and the same person." He continues: "As far as one can gather from all we have learned from Zanzibar, the country between it and Emin Pasha's headquarters, has been so disturbed by this war that no news or messengers have been allowed to pass through the line of contending tribes. It is not only that we have no news of Stanley since last November, but neither have we had any from Emin. To me it is quite evident that we shall hear of both at the same time, and I believe it will be to the effect that Stanley reached Emin about the end of last year. Upon reaching Wadelai it is certain that Stanley would give his men a rest. The four experts all believe that Stanley is alive. Let us hope that the conclusion is correct.—[Baltimore American.

[illegible]'S WAITING.

The Story of a Girl's Faithful Love—Peace at Last.

"When I'm a man you shall have a proper horse, and not a thing like this," he said grandly.

"Perhaps we shan't play together then, though," she answered.

"Oh, yes, we shall," he said thoughtfully. "You know," he added patronizingly, "I may marry you—that is, if you are pretty, and can spin a peg-top, and don't funk jumping a ditch, or do stupid things that are of no use at all."

"Perhaps I shan't want you to marry me," she replied scornfully. "I should like to marry a soldier."

"I shall be a soldier, and you are sure to want me to marry you," he said with decision, and she believed him, and from that day forth she considered the matter settled. And when many a year later he told her, laughingly, that he was only a poor soldier, and must marry an heiress or remain on foreign service all his life, she was not very uneasy, for she felt sure that then he was only joking.

They had many a talk and walk together ere the first spell of foreign service came. Alic Granger's uncle lived next door to Maggie Dunlop's parents, and as her father was an invalid, and her mother was wholly engrossed in attending upon him, the goings-out and comings in of that young lady were not subject to the amount of attention they might otherwise have received. The consequence was that when Alic Granger came (as he did at every available opportunity) to Porlock to visit his remarkably well-off uncle, he beguiled his time away by talking with pretty Maggie Dunlop, until he also beguiled her heart away.

"I have got some news for you, Maggie," he said, one day, about eighteen months after he had gained his commission. "Guess what it is." They were walking along the green lanes of Porlock, listening to the ceaseless murmur of the sea, as at intervals they had walked and listened ever since they could remember, at any rate, for she was six years younger than her former playfellow.

"You are going to be promoted," she said.

"Promoted, you little goose! No one ever gets promoted in the British army. Guess again."

"You are going to marry an heiress;" there was a lump in her throat as she said it.

"Wrong again; no inestimable young person with green eyes, a turn-up nose, susceptible heart, and fifty thousand a year has turned up yet. But it's something nearly as good. I'm ordered to China."

"Oh, Alic!" she gasped and burst into tears. It was very foolish of her, but then she was only sixteen, and had not yet acquired the praiseworthy art of concealing her feelings.

"Why, whatever are you crying for?" he asked, and kissed away her tears. He'd kissed her ever since she was five, and thought no more of it than if she had been his sister, or the cat, excepting perhaps that it was nicer—which it was, no doubt. "I shall be away only five years at most, and when I come back I'll bring you a pigtail and an ivory toothpick, and a whole lot of things, and—"

"Yes?" she said, listening attentively.

"But then you'll be a young woman—I forgot—and 'out,' and all that sort of thing, and won't condescend to speak to a poor lieutenant; you will have all the squires and fox hunters about the place at your feet."

"Not one of them will be like you," she said, and he was pleased.

"Well, I'll write to you, and you must write to me, and tell me all the news, and I'll tell you all the news, and—"

"Yes?" she said, listening attentively.

"Oh,

"But then you'll be a young woman—I forgot—and 'out,' and all that sort of thing, and won't condescend to speak to a poor lieutenant; you will have all the squires and fox hunters about the place at your feet."

"Oh, no, indeed, I shan't, Alic," she said eagerly.

"But I tell you, you will. I believe you are a born little flirt, and I shall come back and find you—" But she burst into tears again, and put up her pretty little hands as if to stop his teasing, which she could not bear just then. It seemed so cruel of him to laugh and joke when he was going away for five years. He did not seem to care a bit, and she could have broken her heart on the spot, and would have gladly done so, and thrown the pieces away so as never to be bothered with it again. Then, seeing her mournful blue eyes, he was merciful. "I believe I shall come back, and find you just as great a little darling as you are now, and if we have got any money we'll get married and live happy ever after, and if we haven't we'll get married and starve ever after—unless, of course, the heiress turns up."

"Oh, I hope she won't!" said Maggie, like a truthful little idiot. "Shall you ever write to me, Alic?"

"Yes, of course I shall, and I shall expect you to write back six pages crossed and all that sort of thing, you know. Poor Maggie, it'll ruin you in postage stamps; it's a bob to China."

"I don't care," she answered recklessly, for Maggie was a fearful little pauper, whose father had ruined himself long ago, and just kept up a patched-up sort of appearance, and didn't know what would become of them all if it ever seriously occurred to his creditors to pounce down upon them.

Maggie was twenty years old when her father died, and the creditors did pounce down, and she and her mother were sold up, and all Porlock and ten miles round talked about them for Porlock and ten miles round loved her scandal as much as the rest of the world, and though it grieved over the misfortunes of others, it still appreciated the subject for discussion they afforded. Mrs. Dunlop was offered a home in London by a sister who was well off and bad tempered, and it was thankfully accepted. Maggie was informed that she must get her own living, which being precisely Maggie's own opinion, as well as intention, she advertised for a situation as governess. Now Maggie had a very modest idea of her merits, and therefore only asked for twenty-five pounds a year and a comfortable home, so no less than five answers came to her announcement that she could teach English, French, music, and the rudiments of drawing. One of these answers was from Woolwich, and stated that Mrs. Marshall required a governess for her three little girls. Maggie thought she should like to live in a garrison place; she might even some day see Alic there, not that she would condescend to speak to him after his neglect, of course, and not that she cared—oh, dear, no! Only, out of curiosity, she should like to see what the Chinese wife he had no doubt picked up was like; so to Woolwich she went.

Mrs. Marshall was a stiff-necked sort of woman, and stared at poor little Maggie (who looked almost as childlike and twice as pretty as ever) through double gold glasses. Col. Marshall, her husband, was a nice old man with a bald head and an iron-gray moustache; and there was a grown-up daughter, a Miss Patterson, Mrs. Marshall's daughter by her first husband, who was really the mistress of the establishment. Maria Patterson had a strong will[illegible] was an heiress. "A[illegible]s, too,' poor Maggie was right, for Maria [illegible]nty-five if she was before her. There sat the heiress, with an eager, pleased expression on her face, and leaning over her, talking and laughing, and more handsome than ever, and sunburnt and soldier-looking, was Alic Granger. There was no mistaking him. The color rushed to Maggie's face, as if to say a hurried good bye and then left it altogether. She recovered her self-possession, however, and walked with what she flattered herself was great dignity towards the piano. She felt rather than saw him raise his head and look at her, and the next moment he was by her side.

"Maggie, my dear Maggie! Why, fancy you being here; where did you come from? I have been trying to find you out for months."

"I thought you——" And then she did not know how to go on; she added almost piteously, "I am the governess here."

"Are you? Oh, I see, then, that is the reason I have not seen you before, I suppose.'

"Do you really know Miss Dunlop?" the heiress asked, coming up, and speaking in her coldest manner.

Maggie wished sincerely she could sink into her shoes and bury herself.

"Why, of course I do; we have been playfellows ever since we were born—haven't we Maggie?" And Maggie, feeling she was backed up, answered bravely, "Yes."

"Oh, indeed! how interesting!"—then, turning to Maggie, "Will you be so good as to begin a waltz, Miss Dunlop?—this was to be our dance, I think," to Alic, and she sailed off with him triumphantly And Maggie's fingers pattered valiantly over the key-board, but her poor little heart felt a terrible load within her. Alic had always told her he must marry an heiress, and the whole thing was plain. Oh, she was so miserable! That was why he was evidently on such intimate terms with the family. She didn't care—she had got over her foolish feeling for him long ago, but she would give the world to be at the bottom of the sea or a thousand miles away.

He came up to her directly the dance was over. "I went down to Porlock to try and find out where you had gone to," he said, "but nobody knew."

"It didn't matter," she said huskily, letting her fingers wander vaguely over the keys to make believe she wasn't very interested in what he said.

"Yes, it did—it mattered a great deal. Why, I've got a box full of curiosities for you—clubs to fight with, and a little heathen god or two, and a statue of Buddha, and all sorts of things. I told you I should bring you them home. Do you live here—I mean in the house?" he said these last words under his breath, for the heiress came up, and the next minute he was carried off to dance with Mrs. Somebody at the other end of the room, but not before Maggie had nodded a reply to him. Soon after this Miss Patterson came up to the piano, and saying she wished to play herself, and that Maggie looked tired, dismissed her without her being able to get even another look at Alic.

The next morning, to Maggie's very great surprise, Miss Patterson came into the schoolroom before the children had assembled. "Miss Dunlop," she said stiffly, "I should like to know where you say you met Mr. Granger."

"At Porlock. His uncle lived next door to my mother. He is a very old friend indeed——"

"Thank you. I merely wished to inquire, because, of course, you must be aware that it is not usual for anyone in your position to make herself remarkable by having long confidential talks with any gentleman who may visit the house.

"I don't know what you mean, Miss Patterson!" Maggie said indignantly.

"I only speak out of kindness," she said, "Never mind, she was only jealous," he laughed. "Now tell me how soon you can leave here."

"What for?" she asked innocently.

"Why, you haven't forgotten that we agreed to get married when I came back, have you, you little coquette?" And he put his arm round her waist just as of old, and was not reproved. It was so very comfortable, she thought.

"No, but you are engaged, are you not?

"Yes, of course I am—to you."

"Oh! but, Alic—"

"Oh! but, Maggie—" and then he stooped and kissed her, and nothing more could be said, for the door opened, and there stood the colonel, and there stood Mrs. Marshall, and there stood Maria Patterson.

"Miss Dunlop!" screamed Maria, horror-struck.

"Mr. Granger!" said Mrs. Marshall, in astonishment.

"Hoity-toity!" exclaimed the colonel "What does all this mean?"

"She must leave the house at once," said the heiress.

"Of course she must," Mrs. Marshall said. "I never heard of such a thing in my life.'

"No more did I," put in Alic, who was always irrepressible.

"To deliberately send the children out of the way, and have Mr. Granger up into the schoolroom; and what is all this rubbish?"—pointing to the curiosities.

"My dear Mrs. Marshall," said Alic, looking as if he were beginning a speech, "it is all my fault. You told me, and so did the colonel, to consider your house my home, and I have done so. Miss Dunlop here was a playfellow of mine once, and when I went away we were engaged, but somehow we lost sight of each other when there were a few thousand miles between us, and it was the happiest moment of my life to meet her again last night; and so I took the liberty of calling on her this morning, and we were just arranging to get married next week when you interrupted us."

"Quite right, quite right, my dear Granger," said the old colonel heartily, "you shall be married from here—"

"Oh! please let me go to mamma—do let me go at once," pleaded Maggie, finding her little tongue at last.

"I think it would be much more satisfactory if Miss Dunlop went back to her relations," said the heiress sourly.

So they all finally agreed, and that very afternoon Maggie picked up her modest belongings and all the curiosities, and went to the well off and bad-tempered aunt.

"But, Alic," she asked in the railway carriage—for he escorted her to London, of course—"why did you give Miss Patterson a ring? I thought you where going to marry her."

"Did you, Miss Goose?" Well, you see, Miss Patterson is a charming girl, no doubt, but somehow the men don't see it, and in spite of her money and best endeavors she has not got off yet—not that I suppose she would have had me."

"But about the ring?"

"Don't know anything about a ring, excepting that I had one mended for her; I broke it in showing the colonel a conjuring-trick. Any more questions?"

"Well, only don't you think you really had better marry an heiress?'

"Don't you think you had better mind your own business? However, I don't mind telling you that poor Uncle Tom died at Cannes last year, and left me all he had; so you see I can afford to have you, miss, and I hope you feel much obliged."

"Yes, Alic dear, I do," she said truthfully."

The bad-tempered aunt received her niece very graciously when she found she was going to marry well the following week. It is amazing how fond people are of rich relations, even though the riches concern them little personally. As for poor Mrs. Dunlop, she could have jumped for joy, only she was too old for such violent exercise.

"Pray, miss, what are you laughing to yourself about?" asked Alic the day before their wedding day.

"Nothing, Alic, only when you were away I used to think sometimes that perhaps you'd married a Chinese heiress with a pigtail.

"The sort of thing you would think," he said, grandly; "as it is, you see, I am going to marry a little girl without a pigtail; and I am very happy, my darling—are you?"

"Very, very," she said; and she was.

The Raisin Craze in California.

Our fourth crop of alfalfa has just been harvested (Nov. 1st.) and the fields are now starting up green and luxuriant for the winter pasturage. There has been no frost yet, or rain. The sun shines brightly, and the temperature is delightful. The raisin packers are still busily at work, and long trains, carrying nothing but raisins, are sent out weekly from this San Joaquin valley to Eastern markets. It is estimated that the vineyards of California will have put in market before the close of the present year 1,500,000 boxes of raisins at $2 a box, $3,000,000; 40,000 tons of table grapes at $30 a ton; $1,200,000; 50,000,000 gallons of wine at 20 cents, $10,000,000; 1,500,000 gallons of brandy at $1.40, $2,100,000—aggregating $16,300,000, an income of over $100 per acre for the estimated 150,000 acres of vines now under cultivation. There will be many hundred acres set to raisin grapes about Hanford the coming winter and spring, in addition to the large vineyards put out last spring and those already in bearing. There is nothing more pleasing to the eye than a twenty, or forty, or eighty-acre vineyard, with its straight and seemingly endless rows of verdant growth, from which are peeping the monstrous clusters of ripening Muscats. F. H. Jewett, our leading raisin-packer, tells me it is a poor vineyard that will not yield thirty pounds of Muscats to the vine, and that the yield is oftener forty pounds and frequently fifty. Thus it will be seen that an acre of 400 or more vines will yield from 12,000 to 20,000 pounds to the acre of green fruit. A shrinkage of two-thirds is allowed in drying, making the raisin yield per acre from 4,000 to 6,000 pounds and over per acre.

Every one is after land, and every one, when he gets land, is after raisins. Ministers, bankers and all—no one is exempt from the land and raisin craze. Rev. Mr. Motherall, pastor of the Presbyterian church here, has a raisin vineyard four years from setting, and was offered $120 an acre last August for the grapes upon the vine before being picked,—which he refused. After they were made into raisins he was offered five cents a pound, the estimated crop being 4000 pounds per acre, which offer he also refused. If he packs them, he expects to receive ten cents a pound, which will yield him the very satisfactory sum of $400 per acre. Nothing delighted him more the past season than to take callers through his vineyard, lifting up the vines and pointing out the huge clusters. He thinks some of them were fully as large as the famous "grapes of Eschol." S. E. Biddle, a banker, tells me he refused an offer of $300 an acre for the raisins from his five-year old vineyard, and expects by packing and selling, direct to the packers, to realize much more. Of course the margin between the prices obtained for grapes on the vines and the packed product is not clear profit

The Ladder of St. Augustine.

Saint Augustine! well hast thou said,
That of our vices we can frame
A ladder, if we will but tread
Beneath our feet each deed of shame!

All common things, each day's events,
That with the hour begin and end,
Our pleasures and our discontents,
Are rounds by which we may ascend

The low desire, the base design,
That makes another's virtues less;
The revel of the ruddy wine,
And all occasions of excess;

The longing for ignoble things;
The strife for triumph more than truth;
The hardening of the heart, that brings
Irreverence for the dreams of youth;

All thoughts of ill; all evil deeds,
That have their root in thoughts of ill;
Whatever hinders or impedes
The action of the nobler will;—

All these must first be trampled down
Beneath our feet, if we would gain,
In the bright fields of fair renown,
The right of eminent domain.

We have not wings, we cannot soar;
But we have feet to scale and climb,
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time.

The mighty pyramids of stone
That wedge-like cleave the desert airs,
When nearer seen, and better known,
Are but gigantic flights of stairs.

The distant mountains, that uprear
Their solid bastions to the skies,
Are crossed by pathways, that appear
As we to higher levels rise.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

Standing on what too long we bore,
With shoulders bent and downcast eyes,
We may descern—unseen before—
A path to higher destinies.

Nor deem the irrevocable Past
As wholly wasted, wholly vain,
If, rising on its wrecks, at last
To something nobler we attain.

Mystery.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Oh, Life! thou art a mystery!
Each living soul a history
Of hopes and fears,
Of joys and tears,—
An ever-present mystery!

Oh, death! thou art a mystery!
Who knows thy after-history?
From heaven or hell
None come to tell
The living of thy mystery!

Oh, Life beyond! Oh, mystery!
We yet shall know thy history,—
So live each day
That come what may
Our souls shall fear no mystery!

Oh, God! Thou art a mystery!
Thy love a world's history,—
In wonder we Shall worship Thee
And Thou shalt solve all!

HATS AND BALDNESS AGAIN.

A New Discussion of a Familiar Topic.

The habit of wearing warm covering on the head is not of recent date, the armies of Europe, for instance, no inconsiderable number of men, with heads close cropped, have worn for a long period warmer and heavier headgear than the modern dwellers in cities, without the same tendency of baldness, says W. C. Gouinlock in the Builder. Nor are the heavy fur coverings of northern races incompatible with luxuriant hair. It is also difficult to understand what injury can result from close cutting, per se. The growth is in the hair follicle, and in it alone; there is no vital connection between the hair outside the scalp and within; it is usually cut closest at the back of the head and neck, where baldness never occurs. Would not close cutting rather stimulate the growth by exposure of the scalp? Such at least is the popular belief. So, too, with indoor life. Women, who ought to show it most, whether in the home or in the factory, are never bald as men are; on the contrary, it is most common with men in good circumstances, as Mr. Eaton's statistics show, men who spend a larger proportion of their daytime in the open air than the indoor worker.

I believe the common form of baldness is due entirely to the kind of hat that is worn, principally to the high hat and the hard felt hat but also to any other head covering that constricts the blood vessels which nourish the hair bulbs. To have a clearer understanding of this, we must remember that the scalp is supplied with blood by arteries at the back, sides and front of, and lying close to, the skull, which diminish in size by frequent branching as they converge toward the top of the head. They are in a most favorable position to be compressed, lying on unyielding bone and covered by thin tissue. Consider what effect must be produced by a close fitting, heavy rigid hat; its pressure must lessen to a certain extent the flow of arterial blood, and obstruct to a greater extent the return of the venous; the result being a sluggish circulation in the capillaries around the hair follicles and bulbs, a consequent impairment of nutrition, and final atrophy. This pressure is not trivial or imaginary, as any one will admit who has noticed the red band of congestion on the forehead when a hard hat is removed after moderate exercise.

DAZED BY THE LIGHT

How Birds at Sea are Destroyed by the Lighthouses.

The attraction of lighthouses for birds is a very curious phenomenon. It is said that just before the Charleston earth-quake all the lighthouses along the coast as far north as Cape May were enveloped by clouds of agitated birds. Many wonderful scenes are witnessed at the lighthouses on some parts of the British coasts during the seasons of migration. Sometimes when the moon is suddenly hidden by a bank of clouds the lanterns of the lighthouses are the point to which the stream of migrants hasten, and where, in a confused, fluttering throng they beat against the glass [illegible] to and [illegible] ely [illegible]

Biddle, a banker, tells me he refused an offer of $300 an acre for the raisins from his five-year old vineyard, and expects by packing and selling, direct to the packers, to realize much more. Of course the margin between the prices obtained for grapes on the vines and the packed product is not clear profit. There are the pickers to pay, and trays and boxes to buy, all of which aggregates considerably. Yet every owner of a large vineyard will do well to make his own raisins, and by careful and honest assorting and packing he will soon build up an enviable reputation and a paying market for his individual product.

It is claimed that ten acres of California orchard and vineyard will afford a family of five persons a living, and a neat margin at the end of every year. A gentleman not far from where I live has eleven acres, mainly in apricots, peaches, nectarines and raisin-grapes. Through the winter and early spring he prunes his trees and vines, plows the ground and puts everything in "apple-pie" order; in May he cuts and dries his apricots; in June, July and August the early and late peaches and nectarines; in September he picks his first crop of grapes and dries them into raisins; in October his second crop, and in November finishes packing and marketing the whole, thus pleasantly and profitably rounding out the year with a saving of $1,200 to $1,500 above expenses.

The Result of a Dream.

There was once a mechanic in Bristol, England, whose name was Watts. He was by trade a shotmaker. Watts had to take great bars of lead and pound them out into sheets of thickness about equal to the diameter of the shot he desired to make. Then he cut the sheets into little cubes, which he rolled in a revolving barrel until the corners were worn off from the constant friction. The Chicago Mail thus relates the rest of the story:—

Watts, after an evening spent with some jolly companions at the alehouse, went home and turned into bed. He dreamed that he was out again with the "boys." They were all trying to find their way home when it began to rain shot. Beautiful globules of lead, polished and shining, fell at his feet.

In the morning when Watts arose he remembered his dream, and wondered what shape molten lead would take in falling a distance through the air. At last he carried a ladle full of the hot metal up into the steeple of the Church of St. Mary of Redcliffe, and dropped it into the moat below. Descending he took from the bottom of the shallow pool several handfuls of perfect shot, far superior to any he had ever seen. Watt's fortune was made, for he had conceived the idea of the shot-tower, which has ever since been the only means employed in the manufacture of the little missiles so much used in war and sport.

Good Reasons for Non-Resistance.

Freedwoman Lizzie, a good servant, was married to an unworthy husband, and made complaint of his unkindness. One of the young ladies of the American family in which she served, desirous of knowing how she happened to be so married, asked her about the love-making and courtship. "Lizzie, what on earth did Watt say to you to make you marry him?" "Law, Miss Sallie," answered Lizzie, "you know I couldn't make no answer to Watt when he come co'tin' of me, 'cause Watt's edicated! And he got some on his words out de jogafy and some out de dicshunary. And co'se you know, Miss Sallie, I couldn't make no 'sistance to Watt."

The bee may fly from the flower,
The leaf may fall from the tree;
But nothing in sunshine or show'r,
Can sever my heart from thee!

The harp may forget its music,
The fountain may lose its spray,
The star may wander erratic;
But never from thee I'll stray!

The curl may droop on the forehead,
The light may forsake the eye;
The blooming cheek may grow pallid,
But affection cannot die!

My heart cannot leave its treasure;
"Send the body if fate will;
O'er mountain, valley and river,"
We are undivided still!

The Coming of His Feet.

In the crimson of the morning, in the whiteness of the noon,
In the amber glory of the day's retreat,
In the midnight, robed in darkness, or the gleaming of the moon,
I listen for the coming of His feet.

I heard His weary footsteps on the sands of Galilee,
On the temple's marble pavement, on the street,
Worn with weight of sorrow, faltering up the slopes of Calvary
The sorrow of the coming of his feet.

Down the minster-aisles of splendor, from betwixt the cherubim,
Through the wondering throng, with motion strong and fleet,
Sounds His victor tread, approaching with a music far and dim—
The music of the coming of His feet.

Sandaled not with shoon of silver, girdled not with woven gold,
Weighted not with shimmering gems and odors sweet
But white-winged and shod with glory in the Tabor-light of old—
The glory of the coming of His feet.

He is coming, O my spirit! with His everlasting peace,
With His blessedness immortal and complete
He is coming, O my spirit! and His coming brings release,
I listen for the coming of His feet.

Petticoat government in the municipality of Oskaloosa, Kansas, seems to have turned out a great success. After an experience of six months under the benign and impartial sway of the new regime the citizens, it is said, find reason to congratulate themselves on the step they took with fear and trembling when they elected to the Council a woman mayor and five women councillors. Until the ladies made their appearance at the Council Board Oskaloosa had been a singularly disorderly and immoral place. Now everything but churches, drug stores and hotels have to be closed from Saturday night till Monday morning, and the laws and ordinances are administered with strict impartiality, contractors' rings have been demoralized and broken up, "dead-heads" banished, and the illegel sale of liquor stamped out. Kansas is now willing to enter its petticoat government for a prize, and back it for money against any municipal government in the world.

A Plan That Works Well.

"Brown, I don't see how it is that your girls all marry off as they get old enough, while none of mine can marry."

"Oh, that's simple enough. I marry my girls off on the buckwheat straw principle."

"But what is that principle? I never heard of it before."

"Well, I used to raise a good deal of buckwheat, and it puzzled me to know how to get rid of the straw. Nothing would eat it and it was a great bother to me. At last I thought of a plan. I stacked my buckwheat straw nicely and built a high rail fence around it. My cattle, of course, concluded that it was something good, and at once tore down the fence and began to eat the straw. I dogged them away and put up the fence a few times, but the more I drove them away the more anxious they became to eat the straw. After this had been repeated a few times the cattle determined to eat the straw, and eat it they did, every bit of it. As I said, I marry my girls off on the same principle. When a young man that I don't like begins calling on my girls I encourage him in every way I can. I tell him to come often and stay as late as he pleases, and I take pains to tell the girls that I think they'd better set their caps for him. It works first-rate. He don't make many calls, for the girls treat him as coolly as they can. But when a young fellow that I like comes around, a man that I think would suit me for a son-in-law, I don't let him make many calls before I give him to understand that he isn't wanted around my house. I tell the girls, too, that they shall not have anything to do with him, and give them orders never to speak to him again. The plan always works first-rate. The young folks begin to pity each other, and the next thing I know they are engaged to be married. When I see that they are determined to marry I always give in and pretend to make the best of it. That's the way to manage it."—[Wasp.

The problem of aerial navigation has been solved to the extent that progress can be made by Renard & Krebs' machine against a fourteen mile breeze. This was effected by a motor of 1,100 pounds weight and ten horse power. Commandant Renard has now perfected a motor of the same weight developing fifty horse power, and with this he expects to produce a speed of 62 miles an hour. In two months the whole apparatus will be complete and a trial will be made from the workshop at Calais. If it is successful there will be another invasion panic in England, the reaction from which ought to overcome the opposition to the Channel tunnel scheme.

ANNEXATION NOT DESIRABLE.

While our neighbors across the line are making buncomb resolutions, in the shape of offers to take Canada into the American union, no doubt led thereto in the belief, that, where there is so much smoke there must be some fire, we may well call a halt to some Canadian journals, who are continually calling every man and every paper in the Dominion who advocates Unrestricted Reciprocity, "Traitor and Annexationist." We say this tirade of abuse is misleading the Americans, because they see the ablest journals and the greatest of our statesmen, as well as the agricultural interests, (the latter class composing about 75 per cent. of the Dominion) strenuously advocating Unrestricted Reciprocity, at the same time the 35 per cent. tariff loyalist are denouncing them as annexationist. No wonder the American thinks the country ripe for annexation, but we can tell our neighbors there are a good many substantial reasons why we do not want any such arrangement.

First.—Because our political institutions are dissimilar and irreconcibable. Ours is a limited monarchy, in the traditions and benefits of which we have been educated to believe, lies the pathway to the greatest development of national character and national greatness. Slow, perhaps, but sure. Their's is a republic, composed of different states, having interests antagonistic to ours, and embracing within their bounds elements of discord, which may yet rend them assunder.

The system of electing their chief magistrate is such as no Canadian could be brought to tolerate. We do not desire to have every fourth year a blank, or as our neighbors' style it, an off year. Besides waste of time, there is the further waste of a fabulous amount of wealth in the ever increasing cost to the country of a presidential contest.

Second.—The social problems yet to be solved in the United States, makes the connection undesirable. We mean the absorption or extinction of the negro race in the Southern States. We admit the wonderful powers of assimulation or ab- [illegible] American people, and freely [illegible] nation under the sun [illegible] and [illegible] bed to [illegible] uri Europe [illegible] atest [illegible] the [illegible] is [illegible]

Postmaster-General Haggart denies the report that he has recommended the adoption of a two-cent letter rate. The Kingston News will please publish another editorial, taking back all of the praise bestowed on Mr. Haggart for doing a thing which he says he has not done. The majority of tory organs are so willing, whenever opportunity offers, to deal out a lot of flattery to the parties who distribute government pap, that it really is refreshing when they run against a denial as the News has done in this case.

By reference to the county council proceedings it will be seen that they have appointed a deputation to go to Ottawa to try and have Newburgh relieved from her railroad debt. We do not know what course the government will pursue, but if they have ever granted such relief, certainly they ought to do so in the present instance. Newburgh has fared badly, and the plucky inhabitants of that village ought to be aided in every possible way, in their efforts to regain their former position. We understand that a deputation will also be sent from the municipality itself, and we hope that the united efforts of the village and county councils will prove successful.

The local Conservative organ last week devoted considerable space to abusing the editor of THE EXPRESS, and lauding I. F. Aylsworth. Our stock of billingsgate is not so large as is that of the Beaver scribbler, so we will not attempt to reply in that way. In fact we are so surprised at the Beaver having a pronounced opinion on any subject, that we are quite willing to overlook the language used in expressing that opinion. That paper certainly owes Mr. Aylsworth a great deal, as reparation for having published his alleged portrait and what purported to be a sketch of his life, just before the recent election, and we presume that they were but doing what they believed to be their duty in coming to his defence last week.

In last weeks issue of the Beaver their correspondent from Beaver Lake made an uncalled for and unwarrantable attack on Rev. B. F. Stratton, of Tamworth. The attack was all the more contemptible as a portion of it was made over the shoulders of Rev. Mr. Garbutt. We are at a loss to know what the Beaver or its correspondent hopes to gain by pursuing such a disgraceful course, but we can assure them that Mr. Stratton is too well and favorably known, not only on his own circuit but throughout the county, to be damaged by any such insulting attacks. In a preceeding issue of the same journal, Mr. P. F. Carscallen came in for a contemptible slur from the same correspondent. We do not know who the writer is, but this we do know, that he or she could easily find better employment, than in contributing spiteful and malicious attacks on estimable people, to a journal ready to fill its columns with anything regardless of right or decency.

The action of the county council last [illegible] in only giving the Napanee High [illegible] a grant of $300 is deeply to be re-

At the present time nearly ninety pupils from the county are in attendance at the Napanee school, necessitating a very large outlay on the part of the local school

THE ONTARIO LEGISLATURE

FORMALLY OPENED for BUSINESS

Changes in the Cabinet—The Mover and Seconder of the Address.

On Thursday afternoon of last week promptly at three o'clock, Lieutenant Governor Sir Alexander Campbell, formally opened the third session of the sixth parliament of Ontario, for the transaction of business. Much of the display usually indulged in such on occasions was left out of this year's programme, so that the opening ceremonies were less brilliant (and less costly to the country) than in previous years. The members of the government were all in their places with the exception of Hon. J. M. Gibson, the recently appointed Provincial Secretary. W. R. Meredith, the leader of the opposition, also turned up, looking none the worse for having recently received the fat solicitorship in connection with the Central bank affairs. One well known face was missing, that of Hon. T. B. Pardee, ex-commissioner of Crown lands, and many were the expressions of regret at the cause of his absence. After the formal programme had been gone through with, the speech from the throne was read, after which Speaker Baxter declared the House open.

The speech from the throne was more than ordinarily lengthy, and dealt with several important questions. Reference was made to the decision of the privy council, confirming the right of the province to the crown lands, including the timber and minerals, situate within the provincial boundaries as decided in 1884; also that the northerly and westerly boundaries will probably be settled by imperial legislation at the next session of parliament. The labors of the mining commission were touched on, as were also the school of practical science, the voters list act, asylum accomodation and the question of the disputed accounts between Ontario and the Dominion and also between Ontario and Quebec. Judging from the matter contained and referred to in the speech, the legislature will have enough to engage their attention for a number of weeks.

FRIDAY'S SESSION.

On Friday the House assembled at three o'clock, and after the presentation of a number of petitions, favoring exemptions, Hon. Oliver Mowat referred to the changes in the Cabinet since the last session. The honorable gentleman paid a glowing tribute to the worth of his late colleague, Mr. Pardee, and told how reluctantly he received the resignation of one with whom he had been so intimately associated since 1872. Mr. Pardee was now lying at his home in Sarnia, hopelessly ill, and would likely pass away before the end of the session.

The recent decision of the Privy Council in regard to the mineral lands of the northern territory, would throw upon the office an enormous amount of increased work, and questions would have to be considered for solution, and negotiations entered into which would make it necessary to have a Commissioner of Crown Lands, in full vigor, to attend to them. Consequently the Government had to come to the conclusion, although with extreme reluctance, that a new Commissioner must be appointed. The choice had fallen on Hon. A. S. Hardy, the then Provincial Secretary, and he thought the House would agree that no more fitting selection could have been made.

The position of Provincial Secretary had ption ... the

... to apt too despise the negro, and underrate his abilities, forgetting the great leaders which ancient Carthage and modern St. Domingo have produced.

Well, 'till Uncle Sam gets through with this problem, we have no desire to stake our fortunes on the chances, but prefer to stay by our own institutions, which guarantee us protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Third.—The fiscal policy of the United States, is such as would seriously cripple our energies, were we to become a part of the union. Our maritime interest, particularly our carrying trade would dwindle into the insignificance into which their absurd policy has driven their own marine.

This fact you say, is equally strong against commercial union; then so much the worse for commercial union.

Unrestricted Reciprocity, leaving us free to push trade with foreign countries, is what we want, what the largest interests in this country demand, and what another election will doubtless place in the way of our getting. When once obtained, you will hear no more about changing the union jack for the stars and stripes and that other rad, Imperial Federation, will be buried so deep that all the lip loyalists in the Dominion will not be able to resurrect.

PERSONAL.

—Mr. Thomas Marsh, of Bath, was in town this week.

—Joseph Roney, of Kingston, spent Tuesday in town.

—Mr. R. L. Meadows, of Toronto, was visiting in town this week.

—Uriah Wilson, M. P. for Lennox, left for Ottawa on Wednesday.

—Mr. Nelson Fralick, of Deseronto, was in town on Sunday visiting friends.

—We regret to learn that Mr. Wm. E. Hudson, of Centreville, is in very poor health.

—John S. Miller, M. P. P., left for Toronto on Monday morning to attend to his sessional duties.

—Mr. Thomas Wild who has been visiting friends in this section, will leave for his home in Manitoba next week.

—Mr. Charles Baker, of Wales, Ont., spent a few days in town this week, the guest of his brother-in-law Dr. Cook.

—There will be a meeting of the W. C. T. U. next Tuesday at three o'clock, in the council chamber. A full attendance is requested.

—Mr. J. G. Corran, of Colborne, was in town on Saturday last, for the purpose of attending the funeral of the late N. F. Paisley. Mr. Corran also paid a visit to his parents at Tamworth.

On Saturday last we had a pleasant call from John O. Sexsmith, one of the Veteran Reformers of the township of Richmond. Mr. Sexsmith is enjoying first-class health, and we trust that he may long be spared to advocate the cause of Reform which is so dear to his heart.

—Miss Ida Johnson, of the Boston Conservatory of music, is the guest of her cousin, Mr. Sanford Johnson, of the Campbell House. We understand that Miss Johnson intends forming a class for instrumental instruction here, which will give a rare opportunity to those desiring to become proficient in music.

—Miss Marie Tilley leaves for Toronto to-morrow, to take a course in voice culture at the Toronto Conservatory of music. Her sister, Miss Maggie, has been at that institution since the Christmas holidays, and we confidently expect to hear them sing even more sweetly than in the past, when they come home for the summer.

A Great Sufferer.

at the Napanee school, necessitating a very large outlay on the part of the local school board. This year the grant should have been fully double the amount given, and we express the hope that at the March session a further grant will be made. We do not wish to make a charge of unfairness against the members of the county council, and will not do so if they will deal fairly with the Napanee school. Perhaps they are not aware that considerable less than half as many scholars from the county, are in attendance at the Newburgh High School as are attending at Napanee—yet a grant of $225 is given to Newburgh, and only $300 to Napanee. We believe that the grant to Newburgh is none too large, but in all fairness let us have a grant of at least as much per pupil as our neighbor receives. Let the county council at its next session, find out just how many pupils are in attendance at each high school, let each school be put on an equal footing, and grant them each a rate per pupil, then no fault can be found.

At a recent meeting of the Deseronto Council steps were taken towards erecting a High School building. On that occasion the mayor, E. W. Rathbun, made some very significant remarks, stating, among other things, that he hoped in the near future to see Deseronto an educational as well as a manufacturing centre. The time has come in the history of our own school affairs, when a policy of delay can no longer be tolerated. The present condition of affairs demand that a suitable building be erected in Napanee AT ONCE. The idea that a portion of the High School scholars are to be quartered on Roblin's Hill, and the others in the western part of the town, both in buildings totally unfitted for the work, is simply absurd. The fact that nearly 200 pupils are in attendance, is owing to the brilliant staff of teachers employed, and not to the accommodations offered. A few days ago, Lindsay opened a $30,000 Collegiate Institute, and now Deseronto intends erecting a $15,000 High School. If we wish to let our opportunity slip bye, we can easily do so, but once gone, we may never have another chance to make Napanee an educational centre. By all means let us have a High School building that will meet all requirements, and not only maintain our present reputation, but add largely thereto.

In the Cardwell election trial on Tuesday the petitioneer withdrew his petition against the return of Mr. White. Application was then made on behalf of Mr. Samuel Stubbs that he should be substituted, affidavits alleging collusion being at the same time put in. Argument on this application will take place at Osgoode Hall on Saturday.

Gen. Boulanger was elected for the Department of the Seine on Monday by a plurality of 81,550 over M. Jacques, the "straight" Republican candidate, and a majority of 54,432 over all his opponents combined. The Floquet Ministry is "knocked out," and there may be other and more serious consequences. The General will resign the seat for the Seine and continue to represent the Nord.

A Boon and A Blessing.

A boon and a blessing to mankind is Hagyard's Yellow Oil, the great pain destroyer and healing remedy for external and internal use. Yellow Oil cures all aches and pains, rheumatism, lame back, sore throat, croup, deafness, cramps, contracted cords and lameness. Procure it of your druggist.

the House would agree that no more fitting selection could have been made.

The position of Provincial Secretary had been filled by the appointment of Mr. J. M. Gibson, member for Hamilton, and here, too, they had been most fortunate in securing so able a man.

Mr. Meredith said that, on behalf of the opposition, he concurred in all that the Attorney-General had said regarding Mr. Pardee—his colleagues would miss him and his country would miss him.

Mr. G. B. Smith, the member for East York, then moved the adoption of the address, in reply to the Speech from the Throne. He made a capital speech, dealing principally with the matters referred to in the opening speech. He devoted some time to referring to the recent victory gained by this province in the St. Catherines Milling Company case, and expressed regret that the opposition should so persistently go against the best interests of their country, simply because those interests were being protected by the Reform party.

Mr. Davis, the newly elected member for North York, seconded the motion in a short address, exceedingly well delivered.

Mr. Meredith replied, after which the Premier closed the debate in a rattling speech, and the address was adopted.

Mr. Meredith did not speak at as great length as many expected he would. He referred to the Boundary question and the License Commissioners, indicating that these questions would be likely to come up for discussion again. His touching remarks over the grave of the inter provincial resolutions were rather humorous.

In reply the Attorney-General indicated clearly that these resolutions were the basis on which the next election would be fought, and that they would be resurrected at an early date. He made a good point when he said that the administration of the license laws was a source of weakness to the government, and not of strength, as supposed. Every disappointed liquor seller in the country, he said, was in arms against the government, and in this way, more enemies were made than friends.

MONDAY'S SESSION

The house only set for about five minutes on Monday, that time being occupied in the presentation of petitions.

Hon. A. S. Hardy announced that an Order in Council had been passed commuting at the sum of $3,000 per annum, to be paid in monthly instalments, the fees received by S. S. Lazier, as local Master of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario, at Belleville, and deputy-registrar of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice at the same place, such commutation to date from November 1st last.

Yarker.

George Miller, watchmaker, is located over Stan. Amey's meat shop.

We extend congratulations to Mr. James Carscallen on being the happy father of twin girls.

Prof. Scott and his assistant have been breaking in colts here lately. They are good ones.

An assistant teacher will have to be engaged for the public school here, as the work is too much for one teacher.

Selby.

Messrs. Alex. Spencer and F. Robinson have gone to Manitoba.

The trustees of school section No. 6, just west of Selby, have decided to build a new school house.

The council held their first meeting on Monday last. Ira B. Hudgins, Esq., and Mr. Mearl Sills were appointed auditors, and H. Vankoughnett assessor for 1889.

The annual cheese meeting was held on the 17th, and we clip the following from the auditors report :

Total milk received at factory	1,149,949 lbs
Total cheese manufactured...	114,309 lbs
Total sales including interest from bank.....	$10,222 09
Total Payments.....	10,220 73
Average milk to 1 lb cheese..	10 lbs
Average price per lb. 9c.

Mr. R. S. Dennison, who has been president of the factory for the last fifteen years, declined to act in that capacity any longer, and Mr. Geo. Cleall, proprietor of the factory, was chosen in his place. Mr. I. B. Hudgins was re-elected Sec. and Treas., and A. Winters auditor. Mr. C. N. Lucas was chairman of the meeting and filled the office to the satisfaction of all parties.

Tamworth.

Mrs. Denyes widow of the late M. Denyes, of Ernesttown, came here Monday evening 14th inst., in apparently perfect health, on a visit to her neice, Mrs. G. S. Hinch. She went upstairs to bed that night as well as ever, but did not come down again until brought down to-day in a casket for burial. She felt something like a slight bilious attack Tuesday morning but did not think it the boys were up to, and in his own happy manner conveyed his overflowing thanks to the kind-hearted people among whom his lot had so providentially been cast. The deputation's report caused us all alike to share the pleasantness expressed by the Rev. gentleman in connection with the event.

Mill Haven.

No stir around here.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fraser, of Napanee, called here last Thursday.

Mr. Will Fleming spent Saturday and Sunday at his father's, Mr. Jno. Fleming's.

Mr. Geo. Forward and Mrs. T. Botting, Napanee, were the guests of Mr. Clinton Forward last Sunday.

We are sorry to learn that Mr. D. C. Forward is no better. He has been confined to his bed for over two weeks now.

Adolphustown and Fredericksburgh.

The friends and adherents of the Methodist church, Sillsville, are preparing for a grand tea meeting and literary entertainment on Friday, Feburary 1st. No efforts will be spared to make this the best of the season. Mark the place—town hall, South Fredericksburg; now follow the crowd.

On Wednesday, the 23rd of January, there was a gay and festive gathering at the residence of Mr. James L. Loyst, Hay Bay, South Fredericksburgh, to witness the nuptial ceremony between his oldest daughter Maggie, and Mr. Roderick Allison, only son of Cyrus R. Allison J. P., reeve of South Fredericksburgh. The ceremony was celebrated by the Rev. J. C. Ash, assisted by the Rev. W. R. Young. The handsome couple, so well mated, received the heartiest congratulations of their numerous friends. They left Napanee by the evening express for a trip to Toronto and other points west.

Morven.

Quarterly meeting next Sunday Feb. 3rd, at the Brick church at 10.30 a. m. We hope there may be a good attendance.

We expect some doings in the White church in the next month. Our friends must look out for the announcements.

Morven has been quietly pursuing its way since last it was reported. It has had a share in the rain and in the sunshine and is endeavouring to improve both.

Mr. Robt. Gibson was severely hurt over the right temple by a part of a tree which he was cutting, rolling against him. It was a very narrow escape from instant death. We hope he may recover, and understand that he is somewhat better.

The post office, about which there has been so much uncertainty of late, because of its non-paying character, is now again assured, the community having raised a bonus for the post master to supplement his small allowance from the department. We are glad of this because the office is convenient and it is very well kept.

Arden.

Rev. J. Wratherdon is on missionary duties.

Mrs. S. Barker, who has been seriously ill, is recovering.

Mr. Herb. Wormworth is going to Toronto next week.

There is a great demand at present for teams in the shanties.

Sorry to say that our school teacher, Mr. Ball, is about leaving us.

Mr. Wm. Youmans has taken a contract of getting out timber for Mr. Green.

Rev. McMullen intends holding revival meetings in the Methodist church next week.

ever, but did not come down again until brought down to-day in a casket for burial. She felt something like a slight bilious attack Tuesday morning but did not think it necessary to call a doctor. On Tuesday afternoon she suffered a slight stroke of paralysis which affected her left side, body and limbs. Her daughter, Mrs. J. D. Wagar, of Enterprise, was at once informed of her state, medical aid secured, and the other members of her family informed of her illness. Doctors Clark, of this place, and Beeman, of Centreville, did all they could for her relief, but she gradually sank and suffered another stroke on Wednesday and again another on Friday. Sometimes she would fall so low as to be unconsious, but most of the time she knew what was said and done, and made ready and rational answers to questions put to her by her children and friends, even to within a short time of the end. She passed peacefully away with a bright hope of eternal happiness, about half-past eleven on Tuesday night, the twenty-second instant. The body was taken to Camden East by rail, thence to the old home on the York road, the funeral then proceeding to the Morven vault. Mrs. Denyes leaves six sons—John, James, Harvey, Thomas, George and Sidney, and three daughters—Mrs. D. M. Wright, Mrs. J. D. Wagar and Mrs. J. Johnston—to mourn her loss.

The funeral of the late Mrs. Martin Denyes, on Friday last, was very largely attended, Rev. Mr. Young preaching an able sermon. Her six sons acted as pall bearers, and the remains were deposited at Violet.

The action of the Lennox County Agricultural Society in petitioning the Ontario government to do away with the township shows, and give them the whole boodle to prop up their one-hoss side parody, has caused the alert directors of the Ernesttown Agricultural Society, to get after them with a sharp stick. They have also memorialized the Hon. the Minister of Agriculture, opposing any such scheme, handling the county institution without gloves. Ernesttown, in almost everything, generally sleeps with both eyes open, and other townships should add their protest to the government, without delay.

Centreville.

The patrons of the Centreville cheese factory met on Tuesday last, nearly all the patrons being present.

Jas. Reid, Esq., was called to the chair.

J. S. Lochhead, secretary, was called upon to read the auditor's report which was adopted unamiously.

Moved by A. V. Price, seconded by Samuel Doupe, that the patrons of Centreville cheese factory approve of the way and manner in which the factory has been conducted during the past year, and that they have every confidence in Mr. Whelan's honesty and integrity. Carried.

Moved by Wm. Paul, seconded by John A. Storey, that Wm. Whelan manufacture cheese for 2½ cents for the year 1889, and that he be re-appointed salesman and treasurer, he to pay all expenses of the factory. Carried.

Moved by Wm. Paul, seconded by B. S. Kellar, that J. S. Lochhead be re-appointed secretary. Carried.

It was moved and seconded that Jas. Teskey be re-appointed auditor for 1889. Carried.

The proprietor, Wm. Whelan, appointed Dr. M. I. Beeman as second auditor, which was approved of by the meeting.

AUDITORS' REPORT.

We, the auditors appointed to examine the books of Centreville cheese factory for the season of 1888, beg leave to report that we have gone over the books of the secretary-treasurer and cheese makers with considerable care and find them (with a few trifling exceptions) to be correct. We find that 1,882,188 pounds of milk were delivered at the factory from which were made 183,038 pounds of cheese which sold for $17,065.20 and which netted the patrons the sum of $13,175.68. This amount was equivalent to a trifle over 70 cents per cwt. from the milk. During the season 10 lbs. and 4½ ounces of milk were required to make a pound of cheese.

We would suggest that the secretary make each month's dividend as close as possible to the amount received for the cheese of that month. All of which is respectfully submitted.

HEALTH.

A Penalty of Tight Lacing.

The unnatural and most injurious habit of contracting the waist and chest by stays, in a vice-like grip, interferes with the functions of all the abdominal, pelvic, and thoracic organs. The circulation and proper function of the liver and spleen are greatly interfered with, digestion and chylification are impaired, the pelvic organs are depressed below their normal level, the diaphram is prevented from proper play, and the ribs cannot expand the chest walls; and the inevitable consequence is deficient respiration and aeration of the blood (and consumption.)

Under five years of age, the census of 1870 and 1880 show more deaths of males than females, from this disease. They also show a gradual increase of females after that age to ten years; and after that to fifteen, the increase is quite rapid, so that at the latter age the census of 1870 gives the deaths of males, five hundred and one and of females, one thousand and fifty-six; and for 1880 the disproportion is still greater. Between the ages of fifteen and twenty, it is considerably more than double. This is the tribute females pay to fashion at that age. Females continue to hold the ascendency till thirty-five years, in the census of 1870, and to the fortieth year in that of 1880, when the males again come to the front, and lead the list the balance of life.—[St. Louis Courier of Medicine.

Treatment of Rheumatism.

A combination of salicylic acid and iron is recommended in the treatment of acute rheumatism, the formula for which was obtained in the following way:

About a year ago a hospital nurse was pouring into a common receptacle some remnants of different medicines, when she noticed that a black precipitate formed by iron was turned into a transparent solution of a rich red hue, as soon as she poured the fluid contents of another bottle into it. Being a young woman of an enquiring turn of mind, she asked the house physician the cause of this phenomenon. The house staff, to help her in her desire for information, experimented with the drugs that she had been throwing out, and ascertained that her manipulation of chemicals had been this: she had first poured into the receptacle a salicylic acid. Into this she had poured a solution of iron, with the result of producing a black precipitate. To this she added some sodium phosphate, with the result of producing a clear red solution.

This at once gave a clue to the means of combining iron and salicylic acid without forming a precipitate. The facts were submitted to the apothecary of the hospital, and from them he produced the following formula; which has been in constant use nearly a year.

One of the hardest working women in England, who has for many years conducted a large wholesale business, retains excellent nerves at an advanced age, owing, it is believed, to the habit of taking one day a week in bed. If we cannot avoid frequent agitation, we ought, if possible, to give the nervous system time to recover itself between the shocks. Even an hour's seclusion after lunch will deprive a hurried, anxious day of much of its injury. The nerves can often be overcome by stratagem when they refuse to be controlled by strength of will.—[Boston Journal of Health.

To Cure a Cold.

An authority gives the following "fine way of curing a cold":—Bathe the feet in hot water and drink a pint of hot lemonade. Then sponge with salt water, and remain in a warm room. Bathe the face in very hot water every five minutes for an hour. Snuff up the nostrils hot salt water every three hours. Inhale ammonia or menthor. Take four hours of active exercise in the open air.

Effects of Tobacco in Excess

Those who can use tobacco without immediate injury will have all the pleasant effects reversed, and will suffer from the symptoms of poisoning if they exceed the limits of tollerance. These symptoms are; 1. The heart's action becomes more rapid when tobacco is used; 2. Palpitation, pain, or unusual sensations in the heart; 3. There is no appetite in the morning, the tongue is coated, delicate flavors are not appreciated, and acid dyspepsia occurs after eating; 4. Soreness of the mouth and throat, or nasal catarrh appears, and becomes very troublesome; 5. The eyesight becomes poor, but improves when the habit is abandoned; 6. A desire, often a craving for liquor or some other stimulant, is experienced.

A Wholesome Stimulant.

Milk heated to much above one hundred degrees Fahrenheit loses for a time a degree of its sweetness and density. No one who, fatigued by over-exertion of body or mind, has ever experienced the reviving influence of a tumbler of this beverage, heated as hot as it can be sipped, will willingly forego a resort to it because of its being rendered somewhat less acceptable to the palate. The promptness with which its cordial influence is felt is indeed surprising. Some portion of it seems to be digested and appropriated almost immediately; and many who now fancy they need alcoholic stimulants when exhausted by fatigue will find in this simple draught an equivalent that will be abundantly satisfying and far more enduring in its effects. There is many an ignorant, overworked woman who fancies she could not keep up without her beer; she mistakes its momentary exhilaration for strength, and applies the whip instead of nourishment to her poor exhausted frame. Any physician will tell her that there is more real strength and nourishment in a slice of bread than in a quart of beer; but, if she loves stimulants, it would be a very useless piece of information.

General Notes.

LEARNING TO WALK.—A young child should never be encouraged to stand alone too soon, or to bear the full weight of its body on its legs before they are strong enough to support it, as, if this is allowed, the legs will most assuredly become "bowed" and disfigured for life. It is a good plan to allow baby to be upon the nursery floor for a short time once or twice a day, and to kick about as Nature may dictate, thus giving strength

PASSING NOTES.

Leeds, England, has a permanent art gallery containing museum court and vestibule, sculpture gallery, and six well-lighted rooms for pictures. Its own collection is small, but the exhibition for the Winter is enlarged by pictures lent from other museums

A circular tomb has been found in a hillside near Epidaurns, Greece, containing skeletons with vessels like those of the prehistoric tombs of Mycenæ, and a bronze spearhead and fibula. It is one of seven, and leads archæologists to believe that it represents an epoch not for a few isolated places only, but for all Greece.

Shakspeare is not relished by the Roumanians. "King Lear," which has just been put upon the boards at the National Theatre in Bucharest, is openly damned by the press. This is what the critic of the leading journal of the Roumanian capital says: "The play is antiquated. The subject dates from before the flood. Instead of being interested in the insanity of the howling king, the public went sweetly to sleep, and won't be likely to come back again.

One of the most lamentable cases of terrible results following indulgence in that fatuous inclination which so many persons have to get off or on railway trains while in motion, happened in Orillia last week, when Mr. A. D. Kean, a barrister of that town, had both his legs taken off above the knee, dying next day. It seems impossible by admonition, to secure much attention to the dictates of common sense in such matters, but surely accidents like that in Orillia ought to preach prudence with tongues louder than thunder.

There is any quantity of curiosity and argumentation going on as to the gentlemen whom President-elect Harrison is likely to honour by calling them to his cabinet. Nothing definite is known, as the General is a man who has a faculty for holding his tongue when he thinks it necessary. Even his friends admit that he is as close as an oyster, a good listener, but a veritable sphinx so far as answering goes. So that it would seem they are all as much in the dark as anybody. The thing is to be settled in the President's own head, and as the responsibile ity will be his in any case he means to settle it without advice.

John Chinaman may be patient under provocation, but he does not always yield his rights without a fight for them. There is a case just now before the Supreme Court of the United States wherein Chae Chan Ping challenges the constitutionality of the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1888. It seems that he went to China in June, 1887, but not without securing a return certificate as required by law from the Collector of the port of San Francisco. This certificate was ignored on his return in 1888, on the plea that the Exclusion Act made it void, and this is the question which the Supreme Court has been called upon to decide.

This is a day of reverses for the German Fatherland. Humiliated in Samoa by the defeat of its forces, and disgraced at home by the conduct of the Bismarck wing in the Geffcken and Morier cases, sackcloth and ashes are the appropriate raiment of the period. The imperious young potentate who calls himself Emperor, started in with much the same spirit as that Jewish King who was going to chastise with scorpions those whom his father had been contented to punish with whips. It will be well if onward results of a similar kind do not follow a similar "pig-headed" policy in the nineteenth century.

Treatment of Corns.

With properly-shaped and sufficiently-large boots, corns rarely form, and will often disappear spontaneously when the undue pressure is removed. They may be best treated by painting them frequently with tincture of iodine, or a strong solution of bichromate of potash, and shaving off with a sharp knife the hardened outer layers thus acted upon. The corn doctor goes deeper and tries to remove the whole conical wedge of epidermis. The soft corn should be hardened by powdering frequently with tannin and keeping the opposite surfaces constantly apart by means of rings of felting, or little rolls of linen. For an inflamed corn, the foot should be kept in an elevated position as much as possible; evaporating lotions of spirit and water should be frequently used, and softening ointments applied.

Sore Hands.

Apply the following liniment:—Liquor ammoniac, tincture of opium, spirits of turpentine, and olive oil, equal parts of each. After washing the hands in the morning, at midday, and in the evening, and drying, pour a teaspoonful of the liniment in the palm of one hand, and then rub the hands and fingers together as if washing them. Repeat the process, having poured a teaspoonful into the other hand, so that the liniment may be equally distributed. Work the hands together till dry. If the sore parts smart too much, the liniment should have a little oil added to it.

Care of the Feet.

Persons who are troubled with feet which at times emit an offensive odor, in spire of all known preventives, will be glad to learn of the following simple remedy which we have obtained from one of our eminent physicians. It is usually the case that those who are troubled in this way are subject to excessive perspiration. No amount of bathing and washing remedies the evil complained of. The softening of the skin between the toes and leakage of the fetid lymph suggest an astringent application, but even a strong solution of sulphate of zinc, will be absorbed producing swelling and more or less distress; but oxide of zinc, not only possesses the proper astringent property, but effectually arrests the discharge, disinfecting the parts, and effecting a complete cure of the offensive m alady.—[Hall's Journal of Health.

Value of Rest.

There is no better preventive of nervous exhaustion than regular, unhurried muscular exercise (says an exchange), If we could moderate our hurry, lessen our worry and increase our open air exercise, a large proportion of nervous diseases would be abolished. For those who cannot get a sufficient holiday the substitute is an occasional day in bed. Many whose nerves are constantly strained in their daily vocation have discovered this for themselves. A Spanish merchant in Barcelona told his medical man that he always went to bed for two or three days, whenever he could be spared from his business, and he laughed at those who spent their holidays on toilsome mountains.

to support it, as, if this is allowed, the legs will most assuredly become "bowed" and disfigured for life. It is a good plan to allow baby to be upon the nursery floor for a short time once or twice a day, and to kick about as Nature may dictate, thus giving strength and freedom to the limbs.

DEAFNESS IN CHILDREN.—The friends of a deaf child have sometimes not the slightest notion that it is hard of hearing; and, reflecting on the faults and corruption of their own nature in youthful days, they are apt to inform the little sufferer that it is careless or provokingly obstinate, and that "None is so deaf as he that won't hear." We read in Holmes' "System of Surgery" of a boy who, from early life, had been the subject of aural disease, and who actually died from abcess in the brain caused thereby, but whose father used to box his ears for what he termed "inattention."

SLAIN BY A BOY FIEND.

Peculiarly Revolting Murder of an Old Woman in a Country House.

CHILI, N. Y., Jan. 24, 1889.—A horrible murder was committed between the hours of seven and twelve last night at Myron Davis' house in the town of Riga, on the Chili road, two and a half miles from Chili Station and twelve miles from Rochester. Mrs. Mary J. Hale, a lady sixty years of age was killed by Chris Burger or Sticklenburger, a sixteen-year-old boy. The murderer killed his victim with a boot, pounding her head and face to a pulp, breaking the frontal bones of the skull and crushing the nose and forehead.

Last evening Myron Davis' wife and two children left their home about seven o'clock to attend a school entertainment. There were left in the house Mrs. Hale, two of Davis' young children and Chris Burger or Sticklenburger (he went by two names). The boy seemed to be in good humor when Mrs. Davis and the two children left the house.

A GHASTLY SIGHT.

At twelve o'clock Mr. and Mrs. Davis returned. On entering the bedroom occupied by Mrs. Hale and the two children left at home with her they were horrified to find the body of that lady lying on the floor in a pool of blood. The dead woman's face was a terrible sight. Lying on the dead woman's breast, its little hands covered with her blood, was the youngest child, aged three years. It had evidently crawled on the body after Mrs. Hale's death. Upon a search being made it was found that a drawer of a bureau in the room in which the murder was committed had been ransacked. A silver watch, a loaded revolver, a half dollar of the coinage of 1812 which was a keepsake in the family, and a bunch of keys were missing. It was found later that the murderer had also taken Mr. Davis' overcoat.

ROBBERY THE PROBABLE MOTIVE.

Young Burger, the perpetrator of the awful crime, had worked for Mr. Davis six months. Mrs. Hale had been employed by the family only two months. She was born in the house, it having once belonged to her father. Yesterday Burger assisted in killing hogs at a neighboring farmer's. No motive for the crime is known, but Mr Davis thinks that the boy expected to find a large sum of money in the house. One theory is that the boy was opening the drawers, when Mrs. Hale discovered him and attempted to stop him, and that he, being afraid of arrest, resolved to kill her.

PAP FOR CHILDREN.—For infants the following is especially recommended:—one quart of buttermilk boiled with one tablespoonful of wheat flour to the consistency of thin pap.

ish with whips. It will be well if onward results of a similar kind do not follow a similar "pig-headed" policy in the nineteenth century.

Public feeling on the other side is being gradually brought to a boiling point on the subject of the moral pestilence which openly flaunts itself in the Wisconsin woods. After all the outcry about the moral baseness of the Chinese on the California Coast, and the lewdness of Mormon polygamy, careful investigation has demonstrated the fact that in the lumbering districts of Wisconsin, amid white men, and so-called Christians, a state of things prevails which is as bad as what is vilest in the most depraved heathenism.

Mr. Gladstone finds some difficulty in explaining a telegram sent by him from Italy, in which he is said to have said that he favoured the idea of having the question of the Pope's reassumption of temporal power settled by arbitration. He declares that he never said any such thing, though he admits himself to have no very district remembrance of just what he did say. It is likely enough that this story will be made the most of by those who give credence, whether real or assumed, to the silly scandal that Mr. Gladstone is already a papist in disguise, and would be only too well pleased to give support to any scheme that would further the Pope's ends.

U. S. Senator Blair seems to be actually in earnest in his efforts to bring about a political union of Canada and the United States. He made a speech in the Senate recently, in which he called upon his brother dignitaries to consider the advisability of realizing the American dream of nothing short of continental government. If the annexation of Canada rested with the Americans only, it would be very easily accomplished, and Mr. Blair would not need to waste much valuable elequence in persuading his countrymen; but since the Canadians would require to have some "say" in the matter, the Senator is likely to have material for "orating" for a considerable time to come yet.

At a meeting of railroad magnates recently held in New York, some very stringent regulations were laid down as to the way in which railroad business is hereafter to be conducted, and in this there seems to be hope that a more honourable era in the history of railroad management has at length been reached. The way in which some of the Western railroad managers in particular have made ducks and drakes of the money of their shareholders, by wasting it in needless warfare among themselves, has been disgraceful, and if a new leaf shall be found to have actually been turned by the recent meeting in New York everyone will rejoice, and the stock holders in western railroads not the least of all.

The Sackville incident seems to have given impetus to a feeling which had already been working in the minds of some American politicians, this, namely, that it would be well to do away with sending representatives of the United States to foreign courts. This feeling has recently found voice in Congress where Mr. McAdoo, of New Jersey, made a speech which he said was in the line of popular feeling on the subject. He condemned the sending of representatives to foreign courts on the ground that it is a useless, absurd custom, and undignified, inasmuch as the Americans have to take a subordinate place to the more highly decorated plenipotentiaries from elsewhere.

The veteran painter Charles Jacque is about to show in Paris six of his most important paintings. In some regards he can be classed with the Barbizon painters, for he settled there at the same time with Millet. He painted chickens as assiduously 40 or 50 years ago as he has cattle since, and the peasants whom Millet admired did not find him unappreciative. Lately his son surprised him with a very fine etching of one of his best pictures of sheep, the father being quite unaware that his son had artistic power. Jacque is the author of a volume on the breeding of poultry, and is said to be a man of uncommon breadth, critical force, and learning.

A strange case of a mother's lack of gratitude to the preserver of her own child is reported from Boston. It appears that one day last summer Doctor Galvin was attending Mrs. Mary Parker whom he had delivered of a child. The child had been laid upon the bed while some special attentions were being given to the mother, when a bull dog suddenly sprang up from one corner of the room and attempted to seize the child. The doctor sprang to the rescue and a life and death struggle ensued, which ended in the doctor managing to hurl the fierce brute through the window, but not before he had received such injuries as obliged him to withdraw from practice for many weeks. He had to sue Mrs. Parker before he could obtain any satisfaction for the terrible risk he had run and a jury awarded him $700 damages.

That the most complete freedom of conscience in matters of worship prevails in the United States is evident from the fact that a heathen temple for Chinese Buddhist ceremonial was recently opened in New York and the newspapers gave full accounts of the performances. And not only this, but so far as we know, not a word of protest was entered against heathenism being thus permitted to place itself side by side with Christianity. Of course any other views would have been altogether inconsistent with right conceptions of liberty. Buddhism has the same right to erect a temple in New York, and even to carry on a religious propaganda there, as American or Canadian Presbyterians or Baptists have to erect churches in Pekin.

The city, town, village and township parliaments have been chosen for another year. Hundreds of people have been deputed by their fellows to manage their local affairs, and in this way to train themselves for important and prominent duties by and by. Let no man despise such offices. Let no man belittle the duties attached to them. They are of the very essence of liberty. They are schools in which men are taught to transact public business, to interest themselves in the common weal, and to see to it that the country or district shall suffer no wrong. Sometimes those chosen may be no great affairs. Sometimes the position of Councillor or Alderman may be sought for selfish reasons. Never mind, the arrangement lies at the very foundation of self government all the same. It is home government in its essence, and nobody but a fool would speak lightly either of its duties, or of its privileges. If things were exactly as they ought to be, the very best men would be willing to serve in such unpaid positions and the country would see to it that these best men were chosen. To affect to despise such positions, and to make fun of those who occupy them, is a crime against liberty, and so far a preparation to its overthrow.

Planets Visible in February.

Four planets may be seen in February. Mercury, Venus and Saturn are evening stars. Jupiter is morning star.

Mercury, during the first week of the month, is visible to the naked eye, having just passed his nearest approach to the earth, and his period of greatest brilliancy.

STATISTICS.

Philadelphia has 847,000 people and 179,000 houses, while New York, with 1,200,000 inhabitants is said to have but 92,000 houses.

The appropriations for the city government of the city of New York have been completed and aggregate $37,637,069. The city debt at the beginning of last year was $128,268,729, since which time $8,187,215 of bonds have been issued. During the year $3,998,539 of bonds were redeemed. The sinking fund contains $43,746,425 in securities and $596,355 in cash, making the net indebtedness of the city $86,170,214.

The Brooklyn bridge is no less a marvel than it ever was, and the people of the metropolis wonder how they ever got along without it. Over 33,000,000 passengers passed over the bridge during the year ending December 1, of whom more than 30,000,000 were railway passengers. Not a single serious accident occurred on the railway. Fifty-eight persons were injured by falling on the stairs or from other causes. Five lost children were found on the bridge. One person commited suicide by shooting, and there were forty-two runaways with slight damages.

The New York "Commercial Bulletin' says the revenues collected by the United States Government during the year 1888 amounted to $375,000,000, or about $6 per head of the population. The highest rate of Federal taxation ever collected was $15.73 per head, in 1866. The expenditure during 1888 was $290,000,000. The interest-bearing debt was diminished during the year by the sum of $100,000,000. The public debt per capital of population was at its highest in 1865, when it averaged about $70 per inhabitant. The interest-bearing debt is now less than $13 per capita of population. The money circulation of the United States at the close of 1888 was greater by nearly $30,000,000 than when the year began, or, approximately, $1 410,000,000, as compared with $1,380,000,000, at the close of 1887; and this large increase is entirely in notes of small denomination. Such notes have been substituted so rapidly for larger ones that it is probable that the money circulation in denominations of $20 and under was greater at the close of 1888 than at the beginning by nearly $60,000,000.

The Dominion of Canada is composed of seven provinces and a number of vast territorial districts, which correspond to the territories of the United States. The provinces bear a relation to the individual states. They are unequal in size, British Columbia having 390,344 square miles o area, and little Prince Edward island containing only 2,133 square miles. Quebec has 193,355 square miles, Ontario has 107,780, Nova Scotia 21,730, New Brunswick 27,322, and Manitoba possesses 113,961. The enormous Northwestern territory, which has been subdivided into Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Athabaska, comprises 1,919,59 square miles, Keewaytin 895,306; the Arctic islands, 311,700, and the islands of Hudson's bay 23,400. Here is an area in the aggregate of 3,406,542 square miles of God's earth. Polyglot is the population thinly scattered over the land. There are 1,200,000 Frenchmen, the Emerald Isle has contributed 925,000, and the Land o' Cakes has 555,000 representatives. Three hundred thousand trace their nearest descent to Germany; there are about 70,000 relatives of Taffy the Welshman, and the so-called Scandinavians number about 11,000 souls. Ontario, the most thoroughly English province, has a population of 1,700 000 in round numbers; Quebec contains 1,600,000, of whom 1,100 000 are French. Nova Scotia contains 450,000, New Brunswick nearly 400 000; Prince Edward Island, 120,000;

MANHOOD
How Lost, How Restored

Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of SPERMATORRHŒA or incapacity induced by excess or early indiscretion.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay,

Mercury, during the first week of the month, is visible to the naked eye, having just passed his nearest approach to the earth, and his period of greatest brilliancy. He sets on the 1st about an hour and a half after the sun. If the evening be exceptionally clear, an observer will easily find this rarely beautiful planet, three-quarters of an hour after sunset, in the southwest, nearly eight degrees north of the sunset point. An opera-glass will be an aid in finding him, and when found, it is easy to follow his course with the unaided eye.

Venus is the peerless evening star, reigning supreme in the southwestern sky. She reaches her greatest distance east from the sun, on the 18th, and then retraces her steps toward him. Her stay above the horizon, after this time, will be shorter, but her size and brilliancy will constantly increase as she approaches the earth. Venus will be seen in her most charming aspect during February, March and April. She must not be mistaken for the "Star of Bethlehem," which has no present existence except in the popular imagination.

Saturn is evening star. He is nearest to the earth on the 5th, and in excellent position for observation during the whole month. He may be found on the 5th in the northeast, rising when the sun sets, and remaining visible through the entire night. Observers can easily follow his course remembering that he rises four minutes earlier every night. Saturn may be known by his pale yellow color and serene, steady light, and also by the bright star Regulus in the handle of the Sickle, a few degrees southeast of him.

Jupiter is morning star, rising on the 1st, more than two hours before the sun, and on the last of the month, more than four hours before the sun. A glance at the southeastern sky after he has risen will reveal the presence of the majestic king of the stars. He cannot be mistaken for any other, for no other star in the vicinity compares with him in brightness.

The starlit sky of February reveals much to interest those who watch the planets in their courses. Venus and Mercury shine in the southwest in greater and lesser glory. Saturn holds his court in the southeast in the early evening, and Jupiter, sole representative of the brotherhood in the morning sky, reigns without a rival as the sun's bright harbinger.

The Chinese Emperor's Wedding.

The Pekin (China) "Gazette" says :—The Board of Rites presents a memorial concerning the marriage of the Emperor, which will take place Feb. 26. Her Majesty, the Empress Dowager, has already sanctioned a programme presented by the board, wherein are set forth in order the ceremonies proposed to be performed. First will take place the sending of presents to the bride, then the marriage, next joint worship by the imperial pair, the conferring of a patent as Empress on the bride, presentation to the Empress Dowager, reception of felicitations, and imperial banquet. The board now reports that it has given orders for the fabrication of a sheet of gold for the patent and a golden seal. It also presents a list of the duties which should be performed by the various departments of State in connection with the celebration, and it will communicate the same to the departments when Her Majesty shall have given her approval of them. At the festivities attending the marriage will be employed 40,000 horn lanterns, 12,000 glass lamps, and 24,000 pieces of embroidered silks, and skilled artificers are now hard at work manufacturing these articles.

Indian Horsemanship.

Given a horse, a man animated by the reckless daring likely to come of a wild, free life, and the Centaur of ancient fable may be fairly realized. A correspondent of the Omaha Herald, having visited an Arapahoe camp, gives the following account of an Indian drill, ordered for his amusement.

Fifty fine-looking young men, mounted upon ponies, drew up before the tents. At a signal from the chief, they began their evolutions, with a loud yell.

In a moment they disappeared over a neighboring hill. Then there suddenly rose a mighty trampling of horses feet, and they swept past again, so compact that I only saw a ball made of horses and men. Splitting in two, one body swept to the right and another to the left, and again they disappeared. Presently they charged each other, in solid lines, and while the spectator waited breathlessly for the shock of collision, the files skillfully opened to the right and left, and the lines passed through the intervals without touching.

Now came the moment for displaying individual horsemanship. Some of the riders approached, each lying so close to his pony's back that nothing but the horse could be seen. Others stood erect upon their animals' backs. Some hung to the horse by one foot and one hand, so that their bodies were completely protected by those of the ponies.

These young warriors also threw objects upon the ground, and picked them up at full gallop, and drew bows and shot arrows from beneath the horses' necks. Some of the men exchanged horses while riding.

Again a men would fall from his horse, as if wounded, and two others, riding up beside him, would take him by an arm and a leg, swing him between their horses, and carry him off.

This exhibition lasted nearly two hours, and, at its close, men and horses were completely exhausted. All that evening the human performers lay in their lodges, while the Indian women brought them food, bathed their limbs and combed their hair.

The celebrated author, in this admirable essay, clearly demonstrates from a thirty years' successful practice, that the alarming consequences of self-abuse may be radically cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, no matter what his condition may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically.

Whispers at the day's decline
Stories to the trees ;
Where the little chilly sounds
That steal across the night,
Stir the heart to sudden bounds,
Only half affright ;
Where the silver lilies pale
Set across the sod,
High above their lattice-rail
Lean and gently nod :
There my pretty truelove goes,
Blushing like the blushing rose.

What can my truelove engage,
Down the garden's green ways straying ?
" Marjoram and mint and sage,"
Hark ? I hear a soft voice saying,
"Mince them fine, and stir about,
Into foaming batter ;
Fry to brown, and then turn out,
Smoking, on a platter.
So I pluck leaves—one, two, three,
Four, five, six—and roll them lightly ;
Spread them over-night to be
Blended well, and mix them rightly :
Thus shall my truelover know
Good housekeeping I can show.

Down where the passion-vine
Rustling in the breeze,
Whispers at the day's decline
Stories to the trees,
With my little truelove here
Often I go straying
She has been my wife a year,
And I'm led to saying :
Poor housekeeping man abhors :
Fast as I am able
I shall hint to bachelors—
If a girl her table
Neatly spreads, and can compound
A savory sweet mint fritter,
Don't delay ! but step around
And try if you can get her ?

School Examinations.

It can not be too often insisted on that examination is a good educational servant, but a bad master. It is a useful instrument in the hand of a teacher to test his own work, and to know how far his pupils have followed and profited by his teaching. But it necessarily exerts a fatal influence whenever it is made of such importance that teachers simply conform to an external standard, lose faith in themselves, sink into the position of their own text-books, and give but little of their own personality to their work. It is true that it is necessary to test the work of teachers ; but it is not necessary for the purpose of doing so, to take the whole soul out of teaching. If examinations are to be defended on the ground that they test the efficiency of teachers, then we reply that other and better ways of doing this are to found, and must be found. We admit quite frankly that they can only be found, and pursued at the price of some trouble and experiment on the part both of parents and those responsible for the conduct of teaching ; but if trouble and thought and experiment are to be spared in this great matter, we had better at once resign the hope of attaining any moral and intellectual results of real value from what we are doing.—[Popular Science Monthly.

New York Loveliness.

"Of late there has been a craze for exercise here which has no parallel elsewhere in the world. New York girls are the most per-

$10 upwards. The salad knife and fork with cut-crystal handles are $9.75 a set. Rose bowls for table decoration are still shown in crystal, but low bowls of silver are preferred for this purpose by floral decorators. A tall, slender vase or pitcher of silver or crystal containing a few rare roses now occupies the center of the table, where an embroidered square of hemstitched linen is also placed, and the huge plateau of flowers formerly seen there is no longer used. Caraffes are little used ; the newest pitcher to take their place is a silver or crystal pitcher in low jug shape which holds about a quart. A charming little pitcher of Japanese porcelain is used by artistic people for this purpose. It is the rule of people of refined taste to serve all iced or frozen dishes in clear, white crystal, never in colored glass, however fine. Occasionally finger-bowls are shown in Venetian glass but this is not considered in the best taste. Fluted celery-boats and knife-rests are especially pretty in the new English crystals which are cut in a variety of patterns, giving play to novel prismatic effects. Little bon-bon dishes are shown in elaborate silver with open-work borders or borders ornamented in repousse work or on crystal or old-rose or Sevres-blue porcelain or the less expensive Royal Dresden or English Coalport china, or any one of an almost endless variety of fine porcelains in market. The only essential feature of the bon-bon and dessert service is that it shall be ornate. The dinner-plates are always severe in decoration, a border of some conventional design being all the decoration allowed. It would be a relief to housekeepers to know that the elaborately decorated silver recently in vogue are being superseded by old fluted English designs.

Cleaning Decanters.

There are several simple and effectual ways to clean decanters. Chopped potatoes, or tea leaves and water, allowed to stand in the bottles for a short time, and briskly shaken round, will be found an excellent recipe. Soda and water is another good thing for the purpose. For port wine decanters, which are most liable to be encrusted with sediments, use sand and water and a long cloth. Lower the cloth into the bottle, holding the upper end in the hand, and then work it round with the sand and water by quickly moving the decanter in a circle.

Choice Receipts.

PASTE FOR TART SHELLS.—Take one half cup of rather thin sweet cream, which has been placed on ice until very cold ; add to it the stiffly beaten whites of two eggs, and whip all together briskly for ten minutes ; add sufficient flour to roll, cut into the required shape, bake quickly, but do not brown. Fill after baking with sweet prunes, prepared by cooking in a small quantity of water, and afterwards rubbed through a colander to remove the skins and stones.

PLUM-PUDDING—REALLY EXCELLENT.—One pound raisins, one pound of suet chopped fine, three quarters pound of stale bread-crumbs, one quarter pound of brown sugar, grated rind of one lemon, one-quarter pound of flour, one pound of currants, one-half of a nutmeg grated, five eggs, one-half pint of orange juice, one half pound of minced candied peel. Clean, wash, and dry the currants, stone the raisins ; mix all the dry ingredients well together ; beat the eggs, add to them the orange-juice, then pour them over the dry ingredients, and mix thoroughly. Pack into greased small kettles or moulds (this will make about six pounds), and boil for six hours at the time of making, and six

"Of late there has been a craze for exercise here which has no parallel elsewhere in the world. New York girls are the most perfectly groomed women to be found anywhere, for they have mastered their hobby, even to the smallest detail of attire. An Englishwoman often has a strong, robust, and 'horsey' look. The effect, in all likelihood, will be marred by a pair of huge boots or ill-fitting gloves. The typical New York girl allows none of these details to escape her. Her boots are triumphs of the shoemaker's art, and she will spend as much time over her gloves as an Englishwoman will on her gowns. The result is to be found in a series of beautiful, perfectly developed, and thoroughly athletic girls, who are clad with a degree of snugness and nicety that is absolutely unrivalled.

"A New York girl of to-day affects plainness in dress just as her brothers of the dudish type of a few years ago affected a certain sombreness of attire. The bustles are small, the skirts perfectly plain and close fitting, and the bodices look as though the girl had been melted into them. It is all the result of the first and great effort in the direction of distinction in the way of building up their complexion. When a girl once eschews candy, sweetmeats, rich food, heavy dinners, and late hours, and devotes herself to exercise and athletics as a means of building up her complexion she sows the seeds of what will eventually be a flower of beauty and loveliness. These are my opinions, and I spent a good many hours of my time observing the girls about whom I am talking."—[New York Sun.

Black-Heads and Freckles.

Black heads are the orifices of obstructed glands in the skin. The following is the proper treatment: Upon going to bed at night, rub some fine oil upon the affected part, applying the oil very freely and thoroughly. In the morning, sponge the parts with a soft sponge saturated with a mixture of one part of ether to two of alcohol. The purpose of this is to dissolve and wash away the fat which has been softened by the oil. The skin should be gently squeezed so as to press out the contents of the distended glands.

Freckles that are produced by exposure to sun and wind may be easily removed by the application of such remedies as grated horse-radish, lemon juice and borax,—one dram borax to one ounce lemon-juice—or lemon-juice alone. Freckles which are present at all times, whether there was exposure or not, cannot be removed by this means, or by any other with which we are acquainted. They are part of the skin, and are so deep that lotions applied to the surface will not effect them.

Dinner Service.

The fancy for dishes and decoration of silver is a feature of the season. Every article of dinner service from the plain soup-plate to the ornate dessert-plate, made with a border in open work and often entirely covered with gilding, is made in silver. On elaborate tables the entire service will be represented in crystal and silver. The beautiful porcelains which were in demand for different courses and were usually chosen in different patterns, are not as often chosen as something more showy. There is at present an increased demand for entire dinner sets of one pattern for regular use and a fashionable fancy for china decorated in metals of different kinds. The Beleck china which is now made with great success at Trenton, N. J., is beautifully decorated in metal work and is comparatively less expensive than fine ware. A pretty salad bowl of Beleck china may be purchased for 7.50. The salad bowl is most frequently chosen in crystal and in a piece may range from
